Session 1925-1926.

THE OPENING ADDRESS.

By John D. Wallis (President).

Read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution, 9th November, 1925.

I am here to-night for the purpose of attempting a task imposed upon me by the By-laws, which prescribe that the President shall deliver an address at the opening meeting of the session. I undertake this duty with considerable diffidence and with a keen feeling that I can but inadequately fulfil my obligations.

I desire, in the first instance, to say how much I appreciate the honour which the Council have conferred upon me by electing me as President of this great Institution. It is a position which, after forty-two years' membership, I am proud to occupy. I can only express the hope that during my year of office I may be able, in however small a degree, to promote and to uphold the best interests of our profession, and that I may do nothing to derogate from the high traditions of those eminent surveyors who have preceded me in this chair.

Perhaps I felt that I could accept the position of President with more confidence than would otherwise have been justified because I knew that the President for the time being invariably receives the absolute confidence and the willing help of all the Members of Council and of the general body of members of The Institution. The duties and responsibilities of the President are indeed considerably lightened when he knows that he has the support of kindly and generous colleagues who will put a favourable construction upon his actions and who will be lenient with his mistakes.

I have been somewhat exercised in my mind as to the matters which I should deal with in this Address. I have been engaged for nearly five years as an official arbitrator, an office which I vacated on accepting the presidency, and it has occurred to me that I might perhaps be of some service to our members if I referred shortly and in very general terms to some of the questions which have occurred to me during the period of my official duties. I propose to refer also to one or two other matters bearing more or less directly upon the subject of the public use of land, with some observations upon other questions of general interest.

It would not be proper for me to say much about the work of the official arbitrators, but I would venture to express the hope that the working of the Acquisition of Land Act has not been altogether unsuccessful. I believe that something like one thousand arbitrations have been held under the Act, and from a point of view which may not be entirely free from bias, I am disposed to believe that, substantially, justice has been done, as between the parties, in those arbitrations.

I was brought up, professionally, on the Lands Clauses Acts, and I have always had a great regard for the valuable and carefully thought-out provisions of those Acts, many of which provisions are still in force, and all of which still apply in cases where the promoter of the undertaking is other than a public authority, a Government department, or similar body.

The procedure of the Lands Clauses Acts had grown to be exceedingly costly, and learned counsel, solicitors, and even some surveyors who are still with us, can recall the time when prolonged arbitrations under the Lands Clauses Act were constantly being heard at The Surveyors' Institution. It is related by the late Mr. J. H. Balfour Browne, K.C., in his book Forty Years at the Bar, that upon one occasion counsel was standing at the door of The Institution when Lord Brampton, who when he was at the Bar as Mr. Hawkins had had a large practice in compensation cases, was passing. His Lordship, with glittering memories, genially said, "Ah, going into the gold mine?" But the counsel so addressed replied "Not a gold mine now, my "lord, you emptied it." Mr. Balfour Browne goes on to admit that there were a few scrapings left in his time, but however that may be, methods had been changing, and The Surveyors' Institution had lost all pretensions to be considered a "gold mine" long before the Acquisition of Land Act came into being.

The Acquisition of Land Act has, I venture to think, cured some of the abuses which had grown up under the Lands Clauses Acts, and particularly is the improvement to be found in the reduction of the cost of arbitrations and in the expedition with which they are now carried out. It is no longer necessary for either party in a dispute as to compensation to consider whether they had not better make a vital compromise, or perhaps an unreasonable concession, rather than incur the heavy expense and uncertainty of an arbitration. The costs are now kept within reasonable limits, and the procedure is greatly simplified.

The difference in the basis of the compensation under either Act is not, in my opinion, very material, because "market value" under the Acquisition of Land Act does not in actual practice, in the majority of cases, differ very greatly from "the value to the owner" under the Lands Clauses Act. This latter usually meant "market value" except in cases of special adaptability and other special circumstances where there was scope under the Lands Clauses Act for claims which cannot be sustained under the later Act. I am inclined to think that the amount of compensation, properly obtainable, under either the Acquisition of Land Act or the Lands Clauses Act is (with exceptions) very much the same, except for the addition of the 10 per cent. for compulsory sale under the Lands Clauses Act. If time allowed, it would be interesting to consider more fully the precise difference in the basis of compensation in the two cases. On this subject a good deal could be said, and there is matter for a long dissertation on the meaning of the words "market value."

I will only say now, in attempting to summarise the Acquisition of Land Act in a very few words, that it enables disputes as to compensation to be settled cheaply, expeditiously, and on a basis which may be regarded as equitable both to the acquiring authority and to the claimant.

I should like to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to the value of the work of my former colleague, the late Mr. Howard Martin, the first official arbitrator. It devolved upon him to initiate the carrying out of the provisions of a new Act of Parliament which was not a simple one. He did so with great skill and ability, and he brought to the exercise of his duties the absolute impartiality of a keen and judicial mind. His appointment was a fortunate one for the profession, and we all regret that he is no longer with us. It is a matter of satisfaction to us that the duties of the official arbitrators are now in the capable and reliable hands of Sir Anker Simmons and Mr. John Willmot, and I should like to congratulate the latter upon his recent appointment, and to say that these two gentlemen have our entire confidence.

I propose to consider now one or two problems which confront the surveyor who is dealing with the compulsory acquisition or use of land for the purpose of providing houses for the working classes. It is right that I should give first place, on account of its pressing importance, to a plea for an early amendment of Section 9 of the Housing and Town Planning Act, 1919, now re-enacted in Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925, but which for the sake of clearness I will continue to refer to as Section 9.

This section, as so many of us know, provides that where property is compulsorily acquired for the improvement or reconstruction of an unhealthy area, the compensation for the land and buildings in the unhealthy area is to be the value of the site only, as if cleared of buildings, subject to a reduction in the compensation for the site if provision is made in the improvement scheme for the rehousing of persons of the working classes on the site when cleared.

It may be argued, and with some force, that the underlying principle of the section is sound. If dwelling-houses occupied by persons of the working classes are insanitary, and are in such a condition that they are unfit for human habitation, they may be condemned and a closing order may be enforced. It would be unreasonable in such circumstances to suggest that compensation should be paid for the condemned buildings on the site merely because they are to be acquired compulsorily for the purpose of clearing an insanitary area.

The difficulty and the injustice arise not so much from any faulty principle as from the fact that cases of extreme hardship are bound to arise when the section, which may be quite justifiable in individual cases, is applied in a wholesale manner to a considerable number of dwelling-houses in varying stages of dilapidation. Many of these houses may be on the border line, and some of them may not be insanitary. They are included because of their unhealthy surroundings. Indeed, it is not uncommonly found that premises which are not dwelling-houses are included in the insanitary area because of their environment.

I have had the opportunity as an official arbitrator of hearing a number of these cases in different towns. In some instances I have not met with any real hardship. I have, in other cases, found that business and commercial properties have been included in the insanitary area, and that persons earning their livelihood in their own premises have been deprived of any right to compensation for buildings, plant, trade fixtures, loss of business or removal, although the premises were not in themselves insanitary and were not used mainly as dwelling-houses. In such cases I have given my award with considerable reluctance and with a conviction that an amendment of the Act is urgently required.

The Association of Municipal Corporations have considered the section, and in the report of their sub-committee dated 15th January, 1925, which report was adopted by the association on 25th February last, they state that the provisions of Section 9 " cannot be said to be equitable to the " owners, and indeed they appear to be so unfair that local " authorities hesitate to put them into operation."

This is a strong condemnation of the section by a body whose opinion is of great weight and whose interest it is to secure reasonable means for clearing the slums. I propose later on to refer to the opinions expressed in the Report of the Unhealthy Areas Committee, appointed by the then Ministry of Health and presided over by Mr. Neville Chamberlain. This Report was issued on 20th April, 1921.

In view of the conclusions arrived at by this Committee and by the Association of Municipal Corporations, it is to be hoped that Government action on the matter will be no longer delayed.

In referring, as I have done, to the general principle underlying Section 9, my remarks must not be understood as implying any approval of the reduction factor. The effect of this is to reduce compensation for the site in cases where the cleared area is to be utilised for the erection of working-class houses. I am unable to understand the reason for introducing this provision into the Act. It has worked out in a way which is manifestly unfair. The owner of slum property, in sacrificing his buildings, should be entitled to receive, upon a compulsory purchase, the fair market value of his cleared site for any purpose for which it is suitable. The market value to the vendor is not affected by any consideration as to the use to which the purchasing authority proposes to put the land after it is acquired. I can see no reason why the landowner should suffer loss merely because the purchaser does not propose to make the most profitable use of the site. Local authorities are placed in an invidious position, when the price they have to pay for land compulsorily acquired varies according to the way they may choose to lay it out. The effect of the section is that if a local authority is extravagant in the spacing of the new houses, and prodigal in the laying out of broad thoroughfares and open spaces, the price to be paid for the land may be reduced to a mere trifle.

Another matter of considerable importance, upon which it is to be regretted that no decision of the High Court has yet been obtained, is the contention, made, I believe, by the authorities in all the arbitrations which have been held under Section 9, that the wording of the section prevents payment of compensation for machinery, plant, loss of business, or removal.

The wording of the section is that "the compensation to "be paid for the land, including any buildings thereon, "shall be the value at the time the valuation is made of the "land as a site cleared of buildings."

I am not a lawyer, and am well aware of the danger of pretending to know anything about the law. I have learned, after a long experience, to be extremely careful not to express any opinion on any legal question whatsoever. But this construction of the legal meaning of Section 9 has very serious practical results. We know, not as lawyers, but as surveyors, that the word "land" includes a great many things. Does it include plant, machinery, stores, stock-in-trade and the business carried on in the premises standing on the land?

Do the words specifying that the compensation is to be the value of "the land as a site cleared of buildings" mean that the owner is to receive no compensation for removal or for loss of business? How the High Court would decide this question I cannot say, but I venture to hope that such an amendment of the Act may be made by Parliament that it may not be necessary to trouble the High Court. As a matter of simple justice it should be provided that fair compensation should be paid for destruction of business or trade.

The amendment of the Act suggested by the Unhealthy Areas Committee, if I may attempt to express it in very concise terms, was to the following effect :—

That compensation for insanitary property should be based in all cases upon the value of the land and the existing structures in the condition existing at the time of the confirmation of the scheme, subject to all legal liabilities to repair, and to Section 21 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, on the basis that the buildings or structures will be retained in their present use for a period of ten years, plus the reversion to the freehold of the cleared site at the determination of that period.

The Association of Municipal Corporations recommend the adoption of this proposal with the substitution of a period "not exceeding ten years" for "a period of ten "years," leaving it to the arbitrator in each case to determine the period subject to the prescribed maximum.

It is not within my province, in a Presidential Address, to discuss in detail suggestions for the amendment of an Act of Parliament. I venture, however, to express the opinion that the recommendations of the Unhealthy Areas Committee provide a basis for a reasonable amendment of the Act.

If that basis is not acceptable, it would appear to me that much of the injustice could be avoided by a more careful classification of the properties scheduled for an improvement scheme. It is not right that it should be possible to bring within Section 9, works, factories, business premises, licensed houses, and other properties which could not in ordinary circumstances be condemned as insanitary, and which cannot properly be described as dwelling-houses.

The practice has been to colour red on the plan of the improvement scheme the insanitary property. For the property so coloured red site value only is paid. The other property which is included only for the purpose of making the scheme efficient is usually coloured blue. For the property coloured blue the full value of land and buildings is paid.

I think the authorities should recognise that it is unfair to colour an insanitary area wholly red. By doing so individual properties are included which are not in such a state as to deserve the confiscation of the buildings. A careful discrimination should result in the exclusion from the "red" of properties in cases where the owner would suffer grave injustice if he received only site value. This careful discrimination has not been exercised. One reason may be that it is extremely difficult to fix the exact border line between sanitary and insanitary property. Another reason, and the reason why so many hard cases have arisen, is that the insanitary area is regarded as a whole, and all properties in the area are equally condemned.

It has occurred to me that there is room for an intermediate colour, say brown, and that the Ministry could place in this intermediate category property which was not in such a condition that it could be condemned immediately. In respect of property so coloured "brown" compensation should be paid on a scale more generous than for the "red," but on a defined and limited basis, less than the compensation for the "blue." The official arbitrator should have the power to change any particular property from red to brown if he were satisfied on the evidence that the owner was properly entitled to something more than the cleared site value.

I think it is important that the arbitrator should have some discretion, although it is true that, if property is wrongly scheduled as insanitary, owners and others interested have an opportunity of objecting at the public enquiry. I am not sure if this power of objecting is very effective, unless it is supported by expert evidence and learned counsel at a heavy cost which is not usually recoverable even if the appellant is successful. Some allowance should be made for the fact that owners are very unfamiliar with the new proceedings under the section. They do not realise the importance of defining their position clearly at the first stage of the proceedings. Owners who have in ignorance or by neglect taken no steps at the public enquiry have afterwards no redress, although it may be when they come to the arbitration-room they realise that they have to suffer grave injustice.

The problem of the clearance of slum areas is one of the most urgent and pressing importance. I recognise the difficulties with regard to finance and the resettlement of the people displaced. I feel that in matters of such great consequence no undue burden must be placed upon the authorities, and that in carrying out their very difficult duties there must of necessity be some hard cases. Private interests must give way for the public needs.

In matters affecting so vitally the life and health of the community, the owners of slum property are not entitled to expect undue or generous consideration; but they, in common with other owners of property, should receive fair treatment. It is submitted that Section 9 is unfair to such an extent that public authorities hesitate to enforce it. I feel that I need make no apology for having referred to this question at some length as I desire to take this opportunity of pressing the matter upon the immediate attention of the Legislature.

In my opinion an amending Act should definitely repeal the reduction factor. Compensation should be allowed for disturbance of business, for plant and machinery, trade fixtures and fittings, and for loss of trade profit unless the premises were unfit for occupation and use. This to come within Section 2 (6) of the Acquisition of Land Act, which provide for compensation for disturbance or any other matter not directly based on the value of land. Provision should also be made for those cases which I have described as coming within an intermediate category, in order to prevent the injustice which is caused by wholesale condemnation.

In connection with the clearance of slums, I should like to say a word in favour of the extension of town planning to land already built upon in our large manufacturing towns. I remember listening in the old hall of The Institution with great interest to a very able and fascinating Paper read by our esteemed member Mr. William Woodward in 1886, on the subject of "London Remodelled." I hope that Paper has not been without some effect on the development of London since that date. I should like to see some of our members in the large provincial cities interest themselves in plans for the remodelling and improvement, on a comprehensive scale, of the towns in which they practise and live. Such plans, even if aiming at the ideal, would in course of time have an effect, at any rate, in stimulating local authorities to take more interest and to give more thought to the lines upon which the centre parts of their cities should develop in the future. Something is already being done in this direction by means of civic surveys.

The present system, or want of system, seems to be that the more pressing needs of street widenings, to provide for the growing stream of electric tramways and heavy road traffic, are frequently attended to in a casual manner. It is seldom that sufficient regard is paid to the ultimate development of the centre of the city as a whole. When so much is being done to secure by town planning the proper lay-out of roads and the allocation of particular areas for industrial and for residential purposes in the outskirts of the towns, and by the schemes for garden cities in the more distant suburbs, it seems a pity that more thought cannot be given to the question of the remodelling of the centres. It is true that the prohibitive cost would prevent any immediate reconstruction, but the future improvement of the built-on lands is a matter which should be considered and planned well ahead, so that opportunities may be taken as they occur. Piecemeal improvements should eventually fit in with a complete scheme designed to give some character and dignity to the towns. It is possible that in some towns—it should not be beyond the wit of surveyors—some means of collaboration between property-owners and the local authorities might be found. Such a method might enable earlier improvements to be made without the expense and irritation of compulsory procedure.

Is it too much to hope that many years hence, perhaps many generations ahead, our large industrial towns may have some pretensions to be considered attractive and desirable places to live in; that in their architecture and planning they may not be ashamed of comparison with some of the finest cities at home and abroad. At any rate we may perhaps be modest enough to believe that in course of time Manchester or Sheffield may be as pleasant to live in as is the centre of London at the present time.

But before this can happen there is one thing we have to look for, and that is an improvement in the atmosphere of our cities. I was very pleased that The Surveyors' Institution showed its interest in this question by giving facilities last session for a Paper read and discussed in this room on "The Smoke Nuisance in Towns and its Abatement," by Mr. Elsworthy. I think it is the duty of all surveyors practising in urban districts to take an interest in this question, and that we should all do what we can to help to solve the problem of smoke pollution. It is perhaps difficult to realise what an immense benefit it would be to life in our industrial towns if we could secure a clearer atmosphere, cleaner buildings, purer air. Town life would again become possible, the development of our cities would proceed on new and different lines, and we should no longer feel that houses in the towns are fit only for those who cannot afford to seek residences in the open country or in the less smoky suburbs. I am not so sanguine as to expect any quick change in the conditions, but I think we should aim at obtaining some mitigation of the evil of smoke pollution. In considering the future of our towns we should have in mind that this is an evil which we do not intend should always remain with us.

The clearance of slum areas offers suitable opportunities for improving the central parts of our towns. I am rather sorry to see that there exists amongst some of our local authorities a disinclination to rebuild working-class houses on the sites of the cleared slums. Public authorities are more inclined to provide garden cities or housing schemes in suburban areas accessible by electric tramways. This is very desirable and, indeed, very necessary, and for my part I do not desire to minimise for one moment the value of the housing accommodation which has been provided or the wisdom of providing dwellings outside the cities. These are suitable and convenient for a large number of people, but there will always be a certain proportion of the population of our large cities who must of necessity live near their work, or who will by choice insist upon living in or near the centres of the towns. It is there that we shall always have the most attractive shops, places of entertainment, the public buildings, and the centre of the life of the city. It is difficult to imagine what our large factory towns would be like in the future if they are to be composed of endless streets of warehouses and works without the variety of residential areas which exist now, but which are gradually disappearing. If the building of new factories is encouraged upon sites newly denuded of dwelling-houses, these new factories will require more labour, and the congestion of the slums remaining will tend to increase. The result of providing new houses at a distance is that only a small proportion of those displaced in the unhealthy area remove to the new houses. The others remain near their former district, and help to aggravate the overcrowding. It may be true that the new suburban houses, if not occupied by those displaced, are at any rate occupied by others who, vacating houses in the towns, provide room for those less fortunate than themselves. This process, however, is the process which creates the slums, the process by which better-class houses, deteriorating in character, gradually pass from the well-being of residences down to the level of tenement or lodging-houses.

The objection to rebuilding dwelling-houses on the cleared slum areas is usually based upon the argument that the land when cleared is too valuable for cottages, and can be sold at a good commercial price for business purposes. The local authority aim at getting back a substantial part of the cost of the improvement. I am not sure that this is a sound argument. I think there are many cases where it would be good policy if the custom, practised to a small extent in some towns, were more frequently adopted, namely, to write down the cost of the land, to fix a cottage value upon it, and to charge the loss or difference as part of the cost of the improvement.

In a large city with which I am not entirely unfamiliar, a city lamentably short of open spaces in a crowded commercial centre, it happened that by reason of the demolition of a large institution a fine open space in the very centre of the town came into the hands of the municipal authority. When it was proposed by certain persons that this area should be maintained as an open space, it was objected that the site was too valuable for that purpose, and it was decided to place a public building upon it. Without attempting to prejudge or to quarrel with that particular decision, and merely using it as an illustration, I would ask what would be said if it were proposed to parcel out Trafalgar Square into building plots because its immense value for that purpose proved that it was too valuable for an open space.

In one sense it may be said that no area is too valuable for an open space where such a thing is urgently needed for the health of the community and the amenity of a city. In the same sense it may be said that no land is too valuable for cottages if a resident working-class population is essential. The gain to the community in other directions should be considered. There is a saving of time, money and energy for those who can live near their work. The community have the advantage of a clean healthy residential area in or near the centre of the town. There is economy in the provision of municipal services, such as schooling, police, transport, water, lighting, and cleansing.

One of the difficulties before the war, one of the deficiencies long before the present acute shortage of accommodation, was the scarcity of four-roomed houses. It had become evident early in the present century that speculative builders and private enterprise which provided so great a proportion of houses for the people were not providing houses of the smallest class. It was a rare thing to see anything new smaller than a six-roomed house. There is always a demand for small houses, not necessarily for the poorest of the people, but for those with small families, or without families, and for single people. It is the dearth of small houses which has in large measure been responsible for the creation of the slums, and which led to the conversion of residences into tenement dwellings. To one acquainted with the slums it is lamentable to see the number of persons and families living in miserable surroundings in single rooms or in a couple of rooms in dilapidated tenements or in "farmed" houses. These latter are houses once of a respectable class, rented by the "farmer" who sub-lets room by room, scantily furnished, at weekly rents which show a gross total which would pay for better accommodation if it could be obtained. The classes occupying these houses are those most needing accommodation, the classes for whom private enterprise cannot provide, the classes who will not go to new houses erected by the local authorities in suburban areas. It is for these people that something should be done on the cleared slum areas, and it is much to be desired that well-designed tenement houses may be produced, the erection of which should be an economical proposition, even on costly land.

It seems likely that an interesting experiment in this direction may be made in London and Liverpool where the special conditions prevailing almost compel the erection of tenement dwellings in certain localities. It is early to say whether general approval can be given to schemes for the erection of tenements of nine or ten storeys, but the attempt, if made, should be watched with sympathetic interest. The city of Liverpool has long been in the vanguard of progress in housing matters. Their present proposals, so far as publicity has been given to them, indicate the erection of ten-storied tenements, with electric lifts, and all modern conveniences, with broad streets giving ample light and air. Tenements of this character appear to solve one of the problems of the slums, that is to provide living accommodation for all the persons displaced, and to provide that accommodation in the same area. In other words, to rehouse all those living in a crowded slum on the same site, in a clean healthy building with plenty of air space. In localities where space is strictly limited, and where it is necessary to house a large population in close proximity to their work—for instance, in the neighbourhood of docks—this proposal for lofty tenements seems to offer the only practical means of solving the problem.

It does not, however, seem to me that tenements of nine or ten storeys would be desirable or suitable as a general means of solving the problem of the slums. Some progressive towns have already provided three- or four-storied tenement flats, and I should hope to see a greater extension in that direction. Modern well-equipped tenements of three or four storeys should include varying types of accommodation from two rooms up to flats of six rooms, and with open spaces or playing fields easily accessible. Such tenements might be profitably erected in the existing slum areas after clearances had been effected, particularly if new methods of construction can be devised.

The possibility of the erection of tenement dwellings causes me to refer to the question of building houses in terraces, whether in town or country. There are some surveyors who regard the return to terrace building as a probability of the future, as a means of reducing the cost of building the houses and of meeting the requirements of tenants. I am not one who would advocate increasing the number of houses to the acre beyond the present scale of 12 or 16. I believe that, for the purpose of the subsidy, the regulation is 12 houses to the acre. I am inclined to think that there should be more latitude with regard to this, and that if a landowner or builder proposed to erect houses in terraces and to give an equivalent area for open spaces, he should be encouraged to do so. It is not every householder who wishes to have a twelfth of an acre to his house. To some people a garden is a joy; to others it is an encumbrance. The provision of recreation grounds, playing fields, allotments, or open spaces is a matter of prime importance to the community, and I would venture to suggest that the regulations should be sufficiently elastic, so that an owner could build houses in terraces, provided he devoted the balance of the land for one or some of these purposes.

It would, I think, be impossible for me to omit reference to a measure of first-class importance to the profession before Parliament at the time my Opening Address is given. I must, therefore, devote a few words to the Rating and Valuation Bill, which seems likely to obtain parliamentary sanction before the end of the year.

The main purposes of the Bill, as defined by the Minister in moving the Second Reading, are to simplify the methods of making and collecting rates and to promote uniformity in valuation.

When introduced, the Bill contained provisions having for their object an extension of the principles which have applied in London since the passing of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, for securing uniformity between the valuations of hereditaments for income tax and for rating purposes. Under these provisions gross value would have been made conclusive for both rates and taxes, and the revenue officer would have been given a share of control in the fixing of gross values. Special provisions were also inserted for the assessment of railways and special properties. A Railway Assessment Authority was to be constituted for the purpose of valuing railway undertakings and hearing appeals against the decisions of assessment committees in the case of special properties. Both these proposals were the subject of strong opposition in Standing Committee and have been eliminated from the Bill, which is now confined to an endeavour to simplify the machinery of rating.

It is a great tribute to the skill and ingenuity of rating authorities and rating surveyors that the machinery established in 1601 by the Act of Elizabeth has been maintained as a working basis throughout the changed conditions over so long a period. In 1601 the population was small, parishes self-contained, and means of communication deficient. The parish was then the only convenient unit for the purpose of rating. Moreover, at that time the relief of the poor was practically the sole object for which funds had to be raised. Since then, not only has intercommunication between every part of the country become general, but other public services, such as education, police, roads, cleansing, lighting, &c., met wholly or partly out of local rates, have greatly developed. These services, although frequently covering a far wider area than the parish, were met either by an addition to the poor rate or by new rates levied, as a rule, on the poor rate valuation. It had long been recognised that the complete alteration in the industrial, agricultural and social life of the country, since the adoption of the parish as the unit of rating in 1601, had rendered the existing machinery obsolete. As pointed out by Mr. Neville Chamberlain in his introductory speech, a parish is still given a local administration and the overseers are still the principal rating authority, but they are subject to precepts from borough councils, urban district councils, rural district councils, boards of guardians, and, indirectly, from county councils. Book-keeping is elaborated until it verges upon the chaotic, while authorities have a difficulty in calculating with accuracy the cost of their various services to the ratepayers. Practical men will therefore be in general agreement as to the need for the amendment and simplification of the machinery.

The reports by the Council upon the original Bill and the Bill as amended in Committee have appeared in the Journal. It is likely that the Act, if passed by Parliament, will be made the subject of a Paper for the Transactions, so I do not propose to deal with its provisions in detail.

It may be sufficient if I attempt to indicate quite shortly the principal changes which are proposed.

The overseers, after an existence of 300 years, will disappear, and the rating authorities will be the borough councils, urban district councils, and rural district councils. It is claimed that by this transfer of duties the number of rating authorities will be reduced from 12,882 to 648. The rates in respect of the various services to which I have referred above will be consolidated into a single general rate. Special rates will continue only in parishes in rural areas where special services have still to be provided. The parish will drop out as a rating unit, and the precepts for country rates will apply at one uniform poundage to the whole of an assessment area. These areas will be county boroughs and areas constituted under schemes prepared by county councils after consultation with rating authorities and other public bodies, and approved by the Minister. Greater uniformity in the distribution of the burden upon ratepayers will, it is contended, be obtained by these means. This improvement in uniformity should be enhanced by the quinquennial revaluation of all hereditaments for which provision is made. For each assessment area a new assessment committee will be appointed, in county boroughs by the town council, and in country districts by the county council, the boards of guardians, and the rating authorities within the areas concerned.

There may be differences of opinion with regard to the changes which are proposed, more particularly perhaps in connection with details, but I think all will agree in congratulating Mr. Chamberlain on having made a statesmanlike effort to substitute a co-ordinated and balanced scheme for the time-honoured but obsolete one at present operating.

Turning now to a matter of more domestic interest, it will perhaps be expected that I should say a word or two on the subject of registration.

It would seem at first sight a comparatively simple matter to obtain statutory provision to prevent unqualified persons from practising as surveyors. The profession of a surveyor is one of a highly expert and specialised nature. He is called upon to perform duties which require skilled training and technical education. The welfare and the protection of the general public depend upon the efficient carrying out of those duties. The surveyor has to deal with matters of great public importance, including all the intricate problems attaching to land and property. The management of land and buildings, the public acquisition of land, the rating and assessment of all classes of property, agricultural problems, urban problems, many other questions relating to land acquired for houses, factories, canals, railways, roads, and public works, are all in the hands of the surveyors.

We attacked the problem of registration in conjunction with the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute and the Land Agents' Society. A joint Bill was promoted in Parliament and has met with considerable opposition. The result of the efforts made in Parliament so far are that the Bill is for the time being held up. Members must not suppose that we propose to drop the question of registration.

On the contrary, it is intended to proceed with it, but he would be a rash man who would predict a successful issue within a reasonably short period.

It is easy to understand the opposition to registration. The profession of a surveyor overlaps in many directions the work of other professional or quasi-professional men. The surveyor has been described as "the handy man" of the professions. His work is extremely varied in character. It overlaps in some directions the work of the civil engineer, the architect, the accountant, and the solicitor: members of those professions are found who exercise some of the functions of the surveyor: such functions as the laying out of roads, sanitary work, measurement of buildings, collection of rents, preparation of plans, and the selling and leasing of land.

There are also a large number of untrained persons who deem themselves competent to buy and sell land and to advise on values of property. We are all familiar with the man who, having failed in every other business which he has tried, is eventually appointed as agent to collect a few rents. He at once describes himself as an "estate agent and "surveyor."

We have, therefore, in attempting registration to meet the opposition of a number of vested interests. We have also to face the difficulty that the profession of a surveyor is not one which can be easily defined. It cannot be kept within such strict limits as the profession, for instance, of the medical man, the solicitor, or the accountant.

The question is not simplified when we remember that the members of The Surveyors' Institution include land agents, building surveyors, land surveyors, sanitary surveyors, quantity surveyors, rating surveyors, mining surveyors, municipal surveyors, agricultural and tenant-right valuers, English, Scotch, and Irish valuers, official, and Government valuers.

The question of registration is put forward primarily as a means of protecting the public. It is in the general interest that unqualified persons should not be entrusted with responsible duties which they are not competent to undertake. The public should have the means of knowing how they can distinguish a qualified from an unqualified surveyor.

The public can at the present time distinguish, if they take the trouble to ascertain, the meaning of the designatory letters denoting membership of one of the recognised institutions, but these letters are not universally understood.

I am strongly of opinion that all the members of The Surveyors' Institution should adopt the term "Chartered "Surveyor." If that term becomes generally known and recognised, we shall go a long way towards attaining the object aimed at in the Registration Bill. We have had the right to use the term "Chartered Surveyor" for some thirty years. We have not availed ourselves of that right. The accountants have made the term "chartered accoun- "tant" familiar in connection with their profession, and in their case to the general advantage.

The professional bodies representing the architects, the civil engineers and the auctioneers and estate agents are all taking steps, or have already taken steps, to secure that the members of those bodies may describe themselves as chartered architects, chartered civil engineers, or chartered auctioneers.

It seems likely that the term "chartered" will in a short time become a word of general use and application. When applied to any professional man it will mean that the person so described is a qualified person in his particular profession. It will mean that he is recognised by an established and authoritative body as being capable of carrying out the duties which he professes to exercise.

In order to bring the term "Chartered Surveyor" into general use in our profession it may be necessary that we should make some temporary concessions. It has been suggested that recognised firms of high standing should be permitted to use the term although all the partners are not members of The Institution. This cannot be done without special provision; but if something in that direction is not done, it must obviously take longer for the use of the designation to become general, and for the public to recognise all that its use implies. This question, so important in its possibilities to members, is being carefully considered and explored by the Council. Meanwhile, it is hoped that all members of The Institution who possess the right to do so will describe themselves as "Chartered Surveyor."

The general use of this term will bind our members together in a way which the designatory letters alone will not do. There will be imposed upon members a stronger feeling of comradeship. There will be in a more real sense an obligation upon them to maintain a higher standard of professional conduct. There will be a guarantee to the public that the term "Chartered Surveyor" indicates a professional man upon whom they can rely for capable and honest service.

Mr. Henry Hartley (Member of Council) said it gave him very great pleasure to propose a hearty vote of thanks to the President for his most interesting, instructive and valuable Address. That pleasure was increased by reason of the fact that this year he personally happened to be the Chairman of the Lancashire and Cheshire Branch of The Institution—a Branch that had benefited very largely by the wise counsel and by the activities of Mr. Wallis; and that Branch was duly proud to think that one of its members now occupied the Chair of so important a professional body as The Surveyors' Institution.

There were some subjects with which Mr. Wallis had dealt in his Address which were of intense interest to all surveyors, which interest really extended also to the authorities of our great cities, and even to Parliament. Mr. Wallis had dealt with the removal of insanitary houses in slum areas and also with the housing question; and he would like personally just to say one or two words on those subjects.

Mr. Wallis had had exceptional experience in dealing with the acquisition of slum areas, and could speak thereon with authority. He himself had also had some experience; he did not compare it with that of Mr. Wallis, but he felt perfectly satisfied that Section 9 of the Act of 1919 operated very unfairly in the case of owners of small tenements. It did not so much affect the rich and large property-owner or the large landowner, but it did affect the small property-owner and the small tradesman. For example, a tradesman occupied a small shop in which he carried on his business with indefatigable energy. He saved his money, and in time he bought his own shop with the house over it. Then he bought the two or three houses adjoining in order to provide a livelihood for his old age and his family. It happened that the shop and the two or three houses were included in the insanitary area. In that case the man was paid just the value of the land, and it might be, under the proviso to Section 9, less than the value. All his efforts, all his work, and all his anticipations were thus thrown to the wind. Those were the kind of cases which had come under his own observation and which he thought pointed to the necessity for an amendment of the Act.

Liverpool had been exceedingly active in the demolition of a large number of insanitary properties. Up to the present time Liverpool had purchased and demolished something like seven thousand insanitary houses. In order to provide accommodation for the dispossessed tenants, they had erected a number of artisans' tenements three storeys in height; but of course the authorities in Liverpool could not possibly provide, in the limited area at their command, sufficient accommodation to house properly all the dispossessed people. Therefore they had been obliged to go to the outskirts of the town where they had erected a very large number of houses indeed of the type to provide for those people. They had extended the tramway service for the convenience of the tenants in those houses, and they were now contemplating the erection of a large block of tenement houses, nine or ten storeys in height, provided with electric lifts, in the district near the docks. Although that brought the people nearer to their work, personally he could not say, having regard to his knowledge of the districts, whether much advantage would accrue from the building of such high dwellings. It must be remembered that the people in those districts generally had large families, and electric lifts in tenement dwellings of nine or ten storeys high might be an immense nuisance.

Mr. Wallis had suggested the erection of artisans' dwellings in terraces, and in that respect he was glad to say that Liverpool had anticipated Mr. Wallis to some extent. It was only last week that he had been round to look at a number of artisans' dwellings which the authorities at Liverpool had built in terrace form. It was more economical to erect houses in that way, and, in addition, the authorities were able thereby to lay out playing fields and playgrounds for the children, and wider roads, and to provide many other advantages which were not available in the more congested areas.

He felt he could not sit down without referring to the loyalty of Mr. Wallis towards The Institution. For five years he had occupied the responsible and honourable position of official arbitrator. The work he had done in that position had been most excellent, and had been appreciated, not only by the authorities, but by private individuals; but when the call came to Mr. Wallis to take the Presidential Chair of The Institution, he never paused to consider the question of emoluments or the position which he occupied, but surrendered them all in order to take the Presidential Chair of The Institution. That was an example to all the members to be loyal and true to their Institution.

Mr. Dendy Watney (Vice-President) said it was a great pleasure to him to be asked to second the vote of thanks to the President for his excellent Address. There were a great many points in it which one could discuss, but as the hour was getting late he would refrain from doing so.

With reference to Mr. Wallis's remarks about the Acquisition of Land Act, there was no doubt that cases could be settled much more quickly and cheaply under that Act than they could under the old procedure of the Lands Clauses Acts, but personally he could not help thinking, from cases which had come immediately before him, that Sub-sections (1) and (2) of Section 2 of the 1919 Act did bear rather hardly in certain circumstances, and were not quite fair to the owners.

He quite agreed with everything Mr. Wallis had said on the subject of Section 9 of the Housing and Town Planning Act of 1919, which was re-enacted in Section 46 of the Housing Act of 1925. There was no doubt that it did in practice work out unfairly, and he thought the President's suggestion of having an intermediate colour of brown was a most excellent one. Probably nobody had had a larger experience than Mr. Wallis of how the Act worked, but he would like to mention one or two points for the consideration of the members.

One was the case of an owner who had asked for a closing order, which had been refused to him, probably because of the shortage of housing accommodation. In some instances the owner was compelled to spend considerable sums of money by the borough council in order to make the houses more or less sanitary for the time being. He thought that where that occurred, and where the owner was not out to make any profit but wanted to close his houses, the arbitrator ought to be given some latitude in awarding him somewhat more than the actual bare value of the land. He thought the expenditure, which in such circumstances was practically forced upon him, ought to be taken into consideration.

There was one other suggestion which he would like to make. He expected the members would think it was a very radical one, and one which was opening up a very bad precedent. Mr. Hartley had mentioned the case of the small tradesman or workman who had set up a little business or a little factory, and had bought his place and had invested his capital in it; but there was another type of man who was very badly hit, namely, the small shopkeeper who did not own his freehold. Many such people in slum areas had only monthly or quarterly tenancies. They had carried on their small businesses perhaps for thirty or forty years—for a generation. In the ordinary cases of acquisition such a man would not get any compensation at all, but his position under the Housing Act was rather different. In the case of an ordinary widening or improvement such a man as he was referring to could find some other place in the neighbourhood in which to start again, but when one came to a housing scheme it was generally a large area which was taken, and the whole of his customers were removed, with the result that his livelihood, which he had worked at for years, was entirely wiped out. Personally he could not help thinking that it would be a fair thing if there were some means of giving such tradesman some little compensation to tide him over the time during which he was trying to establish his business in another part. It seemed very hard on him that he had to lose all the fruits of his work for years and years, and personally he could not help thinking that members of The Institution might devise some scheme by which some small compensation could be given to a man in that position. Half a year's profit would only be a mere bagatelle in a scheme of the magnitude of most present housing schemes. It might very well be left to the arbitrator to settle the amount of compensation.

He had much pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks to the President for his Address.

Mr. Guy Dawber (President of the Royal Institute of British Architects) (Visitor) said he felt it a great privilege and honour to have been asked to be the guest of the Council that night at their Dinner, and in being present to hear Mr. Wallis's Address. He congratulated Mr. Wallis upon an extraordinarily thoughtful and able Paper. He had thoroughly enjoyed it. It was excellent in every way, especially those portions of it which dealt with housing and town planning, a subject in which architects were deeply interested. He confessed that those parts of the Address which dealt with the Valuation Acts were rather beyond him, but that was a matter, of course, that did not so much affect architects. When, however, Mr. Wallis touched upon the question of the clearance of slum areas, and of making our towns and cities better than they were at present, that, indeed, was a matter which architects had at heart quite as much as surveyors.

He was personally very interested in the experiment which the County Council were thinking of carrying out at St. Pancras and Stepney. Whether the erection of eight and ten-storey buildings, with their numerous inhabitants, in somewhat congested sites would be successful or not was, he thought, open to question. It had to be realised at the present day that modern life in cities to a great extent was going to be suburban life, which meant that one was at once brought into touch with the problem of more and more traffic coming into the big centres. He did feel that if the spreading out of cities and towns into the suburbs continued, architects and surveyors, and the public generally, should really make some concerted effort to impress upon local authorities the need for exercising better care and judgment in the houses which they allowed to be erected. There was no question that the construction of the great arterial roads which had been made all over England was quite altering country life. With the aid of motor-cars people now got to their work ten or twenty miles away from their residences with the greatest ease, and the same applied to those workers who came from the suburbs in motor-omnibuses, and it was sad to see all over England, in some of the most beautiful districts around our towns and cities, and also far away into the country, the whole of the rural atmosphere was being spoiled and disfigured by buildings which absolutely altered the character of the country-side. That was a subject which for the last thirty or forty years he had taken very deeply to heart. He thought there was no more beautiful country in the whole world than England, but if they did not take care they would make as many slums in the country as they were now trying to clear away in the towns and cities.

He had been interested in what the President had said about registration. The Royal Institute of British Architects had, as the members knew, just amalgamated with the Society of Architects, who for some years past had been advocating a Bill for registration of architects. Those two bodies had, he was thankful to say, buried the hatchet and were now one. A committee for some six months past had been dealing with the question of registration; they had now thoroughly thrashed out the matter, and were putting it before those whose interests were concerned. It would then go to the allied societies, and the utmost would be done afterwards to press it forward to a successful issue. When registration would come about was another matter; perhaps it would not occur in his own lifetime, but they were doing their best in the matter because they thought it would be for the benefit of the profession as a whole.

He congratulated Mr. Wallis on his admirable Address, and wished him a very happy year of office.

Mr. F. G. Baxendale (Fellow) remarked that the present occasion, if not that of his maiden speech before The Institution, was, at any rate, only his second effort. He felt that on this occasion those who represented the side of the acquiring authorities should join with their fellow-members of The Institution in expressing to Mr. Wallis their very deepest respect and congratulations on his acceptance of the office of President, and to express, if they might, the deep regard which they had for him during the time he was official arbitrator.

Mr. Wallis had dealt with the Acquisition of Land Act, and on some other occasion he might like to have a few words with him as to the effect which that Act had upon the basis of compensation. At any rate they would be agreed on one thing, that the doctrine of special adaptability, if it had not been entirely cut, had at least received a severe "shingle." To-day little surveyors are not frightened in their cradles by the bogey of having to learn about that mythical lady the Countess Ossalinski. A distinct step forward had been made by way of obtaining greater justice to the acquiring authority. It seemed to him that there was a consensus of opinion that the Acquisition of Land Act had been, upon the whole, a marked success. If one could judge by the absence of criticism, even minor criticism, it would appear that both surveyors and lawyers who represented the acquiring authorities, and those who represented the owner, were satisfied that they had in that Act provisions which enabled a square deal to be done between the two parties.

He would venture to say that that position had been reached largely because of the wisdom and discretion shown by the Reference Committee in the selection, firstly, of the late respected and revered Mr. Howard Martin, and, secondly, by the appointment of Mr. Wallis as official arbitrator. The surveying profession was to be congratulated on the fact that those selections had been so wise, as it was quite a possibility that the selection might not have been taken from the surveying profession. In that connection he should like to say that he was very happy to join in the respect, admiration and appreciation which had been expressed to Sir Anker Simmons and Mr. John Willmot upon their appointments.

The President had mentioned the Housing Act, and Section 9 thereof. It was not considered the proper thing to discuss proposals contained in a Presidential Address, nor, he thought, would it be possible for him to do so, but he would like to say that he was perfectly certain that proposals emanating from Mr. Wallis—such sound and moderate proposals as they were—could not but carry great weight. It might be interesting to the members to know that the question of payment of compensation, good-will, &c., in respect of land coloured red would be brought before the High Court in a case next week, so that there would be very shortly a legal decision upon the point which would be of very great importance, and which, in certain events, might render suggestions for amending the Act unnecessary.

The President had referred to the Rating Bill which was now before Parliament. Again, it was not possible for him personally to discuss those proposals, or Mr. Wallis's reference to them, but he would like to say—and he was authorised to say it—that the Ministry of Health was deeply indebted to The Surveyors' Institution, both as a corporate body, and to eminent members of it, for the advice and help they had given in the consideration of proposals dealing with the rating problem. That advice and help had been of great use in the preparation of the Bill.

He concluded by joining in the thanks to the President for his able and thoughtful Address, and by wishing him in his new position the greatest success, long life, and happiness.

Mr. Frank Hunt, C.V.O. (Member of Council), supported wholeheartedly all that had been said in congratulating the President on the able Address he had delivered that night. Unlike some of his predecessors, Mr. Wallis had devoted his time to a discussion of problems rather more closely associated with the town than with the country.

He desired to keep quite strictly within that unwritten rule that one should not discuss or criticise a President's Address or the subjects dealt with therein. He would, however, like to add his word of congratulation on the great success that had attended the really drastic departure from established practice in the appointment of official arbitrators under the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919. He saw the working of that Act probably from an angle different from that of most of the members, although it was quite conceivable that he could see some of it from the same side as did most of them; but there was no doubt whatever that the appointment of an official arbitrator, and the simplified machinery laid down in the 1919 Act, had placed claimants and promoters on a more equal footing.

It had not been an unusual thing for a promoter, not seeing eye to eye with a claimant, to say "Oh, very well, if "you do not like it you have your remedy, either a jury "or an arbitrator under the Lands Clauses Act," and the practice had grown up, over many years, of calling a large number of witnesses on each side (profitable to the members of The Institution, he agreed) with a team of counsel, with the result that any simple claim referred either to a jury or to an arbitrator under the old Acts had involved substantial risk of expenditure on both sides. Promoters, however, generally had the longer pocket, and claimants to that extent had been placed at a great disadvantage. Although he was principally concerned with promoters, he was glad to feel that that longer pocket now no longer weighed to the detriment of a claimant, because after all, as all members of the profession would desire, it should be, as had been said that evening, a square deal between the parties, and the best attempt in the simplest, most expeditious and cheapest way to ascertain what was fair.

Those practising before the official arbitrators had much on which to congratulate the Reference Committee (including the President for the time being as a member of that Reference Committee, whose advice had probably been largely followed in the selection) in regard to the personnel of the body of official arbitrators who had held office under the Act. The late Mr. Howard Martin had been the first to set up precedents in connection with the working of that tribunal, at any rate in the south of England, and he certainly did much to establish the new principle on the soundest of foundations. The arbitrators appointed since would stand, he believed, on no lower level, and although Mr. Willmot was now starting on a new career in that capacity, he had not the slightest doubt that that gentleman would observe the highest traditions of the profession, not only for sound knowledge and experience, but for that absolute fairness which would commend his decisions as being eminently right to the parties who appeared before him.

Personally he had always felt, no matter what the result was, even if the arbitrator differed widely from his own view, that he had been wrong all the while, and that the arbitrator was right. It was only in that spirit of accepting the decision of an arbitrator that they could ever hope to live on any terms with their professional brethren.

The next aspect of the Address to which he would like to refer was the quite refreshing wholehearted approbation which Mr. Wallis gave to the doctrine of zoning in the remodelling of our old cities. He said "refreshing" because it was such a contrast to the report which a special committee of the Council of The Institution had submitted when the proposal had been put before them.

He had every reason to hope that the President's view would, on reflection, commend itself not only to the Council, when they thought it over again, but to the general body of members. There was not the slighest doubt that the big aggregations of population throughout the kingdom could not hope to go on in the present uncontrolled method of development which had been the bugbear of the past, and that if ever they wanted to see the advantages of attempting to control the development of our big cities, it would be to imagine what London and its surroundings would be to-day if that fine scheme of Wren's after the Great Fire in 1666 had been made effective and Wren's wise counsels had been followed out. All the members knew the reasons for the failure of that scheme, namely, the greediness of the landowners, but it was unnecessary really to put it on grounds of that kind. After all, town planning and zoning, which were merely the application of town planning principles to the built-up areas, were really good estate management on the biggest scale; and conditions which every wise and prudent landowner felt necessary to impose in dealing with his own estate ought to be good enough for the community at large.

There had been several coat-tails trailed that night in order to induce him to tread upon them over the provisions of the Housing Act of 1919, Section 9, but he wanted to refrain from overstepping the rule not to discuss a Presidential Address. He would only say that Mr. Wallis's observations and Mr. Hartley's remarks appeared to be based on experience outside London, and he had begun to wonder what had poor little London done not to be recognised, in that it had already done so many of the things which the President suggested were useful experiments for dealing with the overcrowded conditions in towns. The authorities in London had built on cleared slum areas. Some of them had entirely covered the cleared area with blocks running up to five floors. The real point of it all was that one might be able to put cottages, if the ground was not overcrowded with existing buildings, back on to a cleared site, or one might decide to carry the buildings up, to provide equivalent accommodation, giving more space on the ground level.

The real trouble, however, of a slum was that not only was there overcrowding of buildings on the site, but there was overcrowding of persons in the buildings; and if one was going to ensure that the new accommodation was not to be overcrowded by persons, it was obviously impossible to put on to the new site the same number of persons which had been cleared from the old site. That led directly to the next problem, as to where the surplus population was going to be put, and in the case of a place like London, which substantially meant a built-up area 15 to 20 miles north and south and 15 to 20 miles east and west, one had to carry the population a long distance from the centre. The problem for most of the provincial centres was a relatively simple one; one could get into more or less open country within three or four miles from the centre. The whole difficulty in dealing with slums really resolved itself into making a provision further away from the centre and in improving the transport facilities.

He had many other points which he would like to have an opportunity of discussing. Section 9, it had to be remembered, was intended to be a penal clause. The Surveyors' Institution had, on the Bill of 1919, approved it, and he ventured to suggest that, before The Institution committed itself to the view that the provisions of Section 9 of 1919 were unfair in the circumstances in which they were applied, it would hesitate in the light of their past action.

If he might do so, he would like to conclude that the President, in his experience, had felt the hardship arise principally in the case of traders conducting businesses in a slum area where it had been held that no compensation for trade disturbance was properly payable. Personally he was told that that was the view which had been legally expressed with regard to the provisions of Section 9, but, being merely a humble surveyor, he took leave to differ from that view, as he always had differed from it.

He believed that one of the first arbitrators under the 1875 Act, the late Sir Henry Hunt, had had the same problem before him in that that Act did not contain any specific authority for the payment of trade compensation. Sir Henry Hunt, sitting as arbitrator, had in effect said: "I do not believe it is right, and I am going to award it, "and I will leave it to the local authority to take my award "into the High Court and get it upset." Nobody took that action, and for all the years during which he (Mr. Frank Hunt) had had experience of the Housing Acts, now for over thirty-five years, until the 1919 Act, compensation—true, on a lower scale than was customary under the Lands Clauses Act—had always been paid to traders in slum areas; and he would rather have liked Mr. Wallis, when he was official arbitrator, to have had the courage to say, "There is "nothing in the Act which directs me not to award it; I "will award it, and I will leave it to the local authority to "take steps to upset my award." Then a very clean-cut decision would have been obtained.

Mr. Baxendale had stated that a case would come before the High Court very shortly which would at any rate get a judicial determination as to whether Section 9 of the 1919 Act did deprive anybody of the right to compensation for trade disturbance. With regard to the other case which had been mentioned about the small shopkeeper, he always had got compensation and still did, although he must say that the Minister of Health in allowing a figure to be awarded on an average in that class of case had not erred on the side of generosity, probably due to considerations for the present state of public finance.

The vote of thanks was then carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the vote, said that, despite the polite custom that the President's Address should not be discussed, the members could congratulate themselves upon having heard some excellent speeches that night.

Personally he did not attempt to lay down the law, nor would he wish it to be thought that any opinions he had expressed in his Presidential Address were to be taken as other than an attempt to express his own personal opinion on a very difficult subject, on which there were many points of view to be considered.

The only matter to which he might refer was that which had just been mentioned by Mr. Frank Hunt. The reason it had been impossible for him to assist in bringing the matter of compensation for trade or business disturbance before the High Court had been that the claimants in every case of that nature which had come before him had not been people who could afford to go to the High Court or who had the means of going there. That was why it had been impossible to test the point in any case with which he had had to deal.

With regard to the Acquisition of Land Act, Mr. Baxendale and Mr. Hunt had been able to say what he himself had not been perhaps able to say, and with their remarks on that subject he entirely agreed.

The point referred to by Mr. Hartley was really important in considering Section 9, namely, that so much of the slum property was in the hands of poor people who had invested their savings in it.

He would content himself with thanking the members very much for their vote of thanks, and for the way in which they had received his Address.

The meeting then terminated.

PAPER 495.

MODERN METHODS OF ROAD-MAKING.

By C. Herbert Bressey, C.B.E. (Fellow)
(Chief Engineer, Roads Department, Ministry of Transport).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 7th December, 1925.

Before embarking upon this subject of " Modern Methods " of Road-making," I should first explain that my position in the matter is largely that of a spectator. It is sometimes said, by the way, that the spectator sees most of the game, but however that may be, it should be clearly understood that my descriptions and illustrations are drawn from the operations conducted by my departmental colleagues or by the engineers of local authorities with whom the Ministry of Transport has the privilege of collaborating. The co-operation is, I am glad to say, of the closest and most cordial character, and it is due in great part to this spirit of genial fellowship that the extension of road construction on an ever-increasing scale has become possible throughout the United Kingdom.

The introduction of the word " modern " appears to call for some attempt to define the principal features distinguishing to-day's practice from that of the recent past. For the surface of our roads we are seeking more and more permanent and impervious materials which will avoid the vexatious process of frequent renewal. Incidentally, an impervious surface will enable the camber or cross-fall of the carriage-way to be reduced, thereby adding to the safety and convenience of drivers. Cambers of 1 in 24 and even steeper used to be common. In modern practice this has been reduced to 1 in 48. We are trying to provide highways of such width that it shall not be necessary to lay mains and pipes under the carriage-way. The wide road has the further advantage of allowing space for tree-planting, and of keeping the noise and vibration of traffic at a tolerable distance from the future householder's windows. We aim at the suppression of abrupt changes of direction and sharp bends,—substituting easy curves of long radius. Where, owing to the configuration of the ground, curves of slight radius are unavoidable, the outer edge is super-elevated or banked. Steep gradients, which so frequently occur on the rigidly straight Roman roads, are avoided by modifying the line to suit the contours of the hill-side. In laying out the new arterial roads in the neighbourhood of London, it has almost invariably been found possible to limit the gradients to 1 in 30. Besides studying the need of traffic, we desire, in forming new roads, so to locate them as to promote the development of the area traversed and increase its attractions. The Roads Improvement Act, passed last Session, gives recognition to this principle by conferring upon the Ministry and highway authorities the power to incur expenditure upon tree-planting.

Arterial Roads.

In considering the dimensions to be adopted for new arterial roads, there is one important determining factor that must be taken into account, viz., the provision to be made for gas and water mains and other underground services of public utility. Hitherto it has been the practice to allow these to be placed under the carriage-way, most of our older roads consisting, indeed, of nothing but carriage-way. Now, however, that more and more costly and permanent methods of construction are being adopted for carriage-ways, and graver inconvenience is caused to the public by their disturbance, there will certainly be a tendency in the case of important new roads to keep the entire carriage-way free from underground services and to limit them to the verges or footways.

An even better solution would be to reserve a special space for these services, so that foot-passengers should not be liable to unnecessary discomfort when repairs or renewals are in progress, and so that the verges could be planted with trees. As showing the amount of space required for pipes and conduits of different sorts, I will quote two recent instances: On one of the new arterial roads leading out of London a bridge is being constructed over a river; the footways of the bridge are each 10 feet wide, and are so formed as to provide continuous subways for mains. Although the road passes through what is largely undeveloped land, the demand for space in these subways is already sufficient to fill them. The other case is that of a new arterial road radiating from London through open country and possessing a width between fences of 100 feet. Two carriage-ways will occupy 50 feet, leaving another 50 feet for footways, verges, &c. An investigation has recently been made as to the requirements of the multifarious public utility services that will need accommodation in the subsoil, and a scheme has been prepared for spacing them methodically and conveniently so as not to encroach upon the carriage-way. As the outcome of this enquiry it is found far from easy to allot the requisite accommodation within the limits of the 50 feet available. How the additional demands of the future are to be met is a disquieting problem, unless we are to dispense with roadside trees in order to devote more space to subterranean services. It is worth considering whether some of the services, such as sewers, might not be laid at the back of the buildings instead of in the street itself. When criticism is directed to the excessive and extravagant width of new arterial roads, it is worth remembering that modern civilisation demands of the road engineer something more than a mere carriage-way and footway; ample space must also be provided for the public services without which the frontages cannot be utilised, and also for the trees and plantations which are so badly needed to redeem the monotony of long highways.

If further justification is required for wide main roads, it may be mentioned that spacious footways and verges on each side of a carriage-way promote the safety of drivers entering from side roads. They gain a wider range of view on each side, and secure an extra fraction of a second for deliberation before venturing into the main stream of traffic.

Although one may assume that in open country the expense of constructing continuous subways under new roads would be entirely unjustified, the same remark does not necessarily apply to densely populated cities. Here one might perhaps contemplate that in course of time we shall evolve a double-decker street, the upper surface carrying traffic, while the lower deck, extending the full width of the street, would be reserved for mains of every kind. Should such a system materialise, one can conceive that the upper deck might ultimately be constructed of separate slabs of standard size bolted into position and capable of instantaneous removal to give access to a pipe below. The same facility for removal would greatly expedite repairs, as a worn-slab could be taken out and a new one brought from stock and dropped into position. The cost of a road so constructed would reach a very high figure, but against this there is to be set the elimination of the perpetually recurring expenditure upon excavation, and the consequent loss imposed upon trade and travellers. The authorities responsible for public services could afford to pay a handsome rental for subway accommodation.

Discussion will continue to range round the relative advantages and disadvantages, on the one hand, of a single wide carriage-way, as seen on the new Great West Road, or, on the other hand, of the duplicate carriage-ways for up and down traffic respectively, following the model adopted for many of the Greater London arterial roads. For the single carriage-way the plea is advanced that when the current of traffic sets strongly in one direction and then reverses, as in the case of race-goers proceeding to a meeting and returning after the races, a single carriage-way 50 feet wide will obviously carry a larger volume of traffic than two separate carriage-ways each measuring 25 feet in width.

On the other hand the very wide carriage-way is inconvenient and even dangerous for the pedestrian to cross; motorists, too, have been heard to complain that in misty weather it is not always easy to locate the position of one's car between two distant kerbs, and one may assume that the risk of accidents would be lessened if traffic were kept in two separate streams on separate tracks. Another practical argument in favour of this latter device is that it lends itself conveniently to progressive development. In the first instance, while the country alongside the road remains open, a single carriage-way can be formed and will probably suffice for some years. As traffic increases and buildings spring up along the road frontages, the second carriage-way can be constructed without interfering in any way with the road which is already in use.

Road Widenings.

With regard to the dimensions to be prescribed for carriage-ways of roads, it has been the policy of the Ministry of Transport to urge the adoption of 10 feet as the unit of width; thus 20 feet would be recommended for a carriage-way accommodating two streams of traffic, 30 feet for three streams, and so on. Much greater difficulty arises when an attempt is made to lay down suitable dimensions for the highway itself, i.e., the width between fences. A year ago the problem was studied in relation to the highways ranking as Class I. in the Ministry's classification scheme. While dismissing from consideration at one end of the scale the highways traversing moorlands and highlands, and at the other end of the scale the roads on outskirts of great towns, attention was concentrated on the Class I. roads traversing the more or less open country which separates large centres of population. In the case of such roads which usually possess a carriage-way varying from 15 feet to 25 feet in width, with little, if any, footway, it was suggested, subject to various reservations, that, when widening becomes necessary, sufficient land should be acquired to allow a dimension of 60 feet between fences. This would allow for a carriage-way 30 feet wide, two 8-feet footways, and two 7-feet verges. It does not follow that either carriage-ways or footways of these dimensions should be constructed at once, but it is pointed out that if fences and walls have to be set back and property disturbed, it is advisable to secure land on this suggested scale so as to avoid the risk of incurring fresh claims for renewed widenings within a short period.

The modern road engineer is more often than not compelled to embody in his work, on the score of economy, large portions of existing highways which have been built up, more or less fortuitously, by the roadmen of the past. Most of the road construction in progress to-day consists of the utilisation, adaptation and modernisation of this ancient highway system, which is becoming every year less suitable for the traffic which uses it. For evidence of the changing conditions on our highways one need only turn to the traffic census on Class I. roads. One such census was taken in 1922, and figures will shortly be available for the second census taken last August. Some of the comparisons that can already be instituted are sufficiently startling. In one of the great industrial counties of the north the increase of traffic can be assessed at upwards of 90 per cent., and in a comparatively rural county in the same region the increase is 66 per cent. Such figures as these tend to support the policy pursued by the Ministry of Transport under the trunk road programme which is now in progress, thanks to the collaboration of the Ministry and the county councils.

Let me sketch the methods which road engineers are adopting in modernising the roads comprised in this programme. Picture to yourselves the London-Oxford Road, passing through the counties of Bucks and Oxon, starting from the point where the new Western Avenue will in a year or two's time deliver London traffic, just clear of Uxbridge. From here westwards the present road is narrow, some of the cross-roads afford very inadequate sight line, and many of the curves are too abrupt. After traversing West Wycombe, the ascent of the Chilterns has to be faced, and here the present route known as Dashwoods Hill has a gradient of 1 in 10·5. On the Oxfordshire slope of the Chilterns the road, which descends from 800 feet above Ordnance datum to 400 feet, is more considerately laid out, but on the level ground between the Chilterns and the city of Oxford the road is narrow and winds abruptly. There are several dangerous cross-roads.

The works now contemplated may be briefly described as follows: Adequate surface drainage, for want of which the road has hitherto suffered, will be provided; the carriage-way will be widened to 20 feet in open country, and to 30 feet in urban or surburban areas: a continuous footway, at least 5 feet wide, will be formed, as well as a spacious verge. In hunting counties this unpaved space will be warmly appreciated by horsemen. At any point where land has to be acquired for widening, it is the intention to purchase sufficient to afford a dimension of 60 feet between walls or hedges, so as to avoid the risk of additional purchases having to be made in the near future for further improvements. In widening and regulating the carriage-way the ground is excavated on each side, the existing haunches, where weak, are cut back, and a foundation is formed of cement-concrete from 6 inches to 9 inches in thickness, strengthened with reinforcement where requisite. The concrete plays a useful part, not only as a foundation for the new road surface, but also as a lateral abutment for the arch of the carriage-way. Where clay or loam underlies the road, it is often advisable to lay a bed of clinker or other similar material from 4 inches to 8 inches in thickness, to serve, after thorough consolidation, as a foundation for the concrete. The ascent of the Chilterns on the Buckinghamshire side known as Dashwoods Hill required drastic handling, the present road having, as already explained, a gradient of 1 in 10·5. The only remedy was a diversion slightly over a mile in length skirting the shoulder of the hill and laid out with a uniform gradient of 1 in 22·5. The carriage-way, 20 feet wide, will be of reinforced concrete 7 inches thick with a 5-feet footway.

Down the Oxfordshire slope of the Chilterns known as Aston Hill it is proposed to form alongside the carriage-way a stone-faced reinforced concrete track which will afford foothold for horses mounting the hill. Across the level country towards Oxford many sections of the road are being re-aligned so as to eliminate abrupt turns. Here and there it should be possible to close the disused sections of highway. Generally speaking, for the new lengths of road, a reinforced concrete foundation 8 inches think will be laid, covered with an asphaltic carpeting or asphalt macadam. Reinforced concrete kerb-blocks will line the carriage-way. Although for some reasons granite kerbs might be preferred, the concrete kerb has the advantage of allowing unskilled local labour to be employed and also of affecting a saving in transport. At a cross-roads where the sight-line is dangerously restricted by buildings, one of the roads will be skewed so as to impose a check on the speed of traffic approaching the danger spot. In the case of all new construction where the road has to be carried on an embankment exceeding 4 or 5 feet in depth, it is customary to employ temporary surfacing materials which can be patched and renewed until such time as the bank has attained complete consolidation, when a permanent surface can be applied.

Viaducts.

Occasionally the road engineer has the good fortune to be able to break away from the routine practice of constructing roads which follow slavishly the surface levels of the ground and to embark upon an undertaking which gives more scope for imagination. As an example of one of these higher flights, I will give you a few particulars of a section of the North Circular Road between Edmonton and Chingford. Here the flat and low-lying valley of the Lea has to be crossed in order to connect the counties of Middlesex and Essex. It was debated for some time whether the new road should be raised above flood level on an earth bank, in accordance with the usual practice; but having regard to the number of watercourses to be crossed, the difficulty of obtaining sufficient soil for the bank, and the length of time that must elapse before the bank would attain ultimate consolidation, it was decided that the purpose would be better served by a reinforced concrete viaduct which would impose no perceptible obstacle upon the flow of flood-water down the valley, and would take all the streams, watercourses and other impediments in its stride. It would, moreover, present the great merit of being capable of completion at a single operation. Resting on a firm foundation of concrete piles, the new structure could be given its permanent running surface as soon as the concrete decking had set, whereas in the case of a high earth bank piled on a marshy meadow, some years must elapse before the permanent road surface can safely be imposed, owing to the lengthy process of consolidation to which such banks are subject. The viaduct designed by Sir Owen Williams, and illustrated by slides and models, extends for a length of about 600 yards, and measures 60 feet in width between parapets. There are two 10-feet footways and a 40-feet carriage-way. Underneath the footways is space for mains, pipes, &c., whereas the carriage-way will be entirely free from any services whatever.

To anyone who knows the deficiencies of the present communications across the Lea Valley—the narrow tortuous roads, subject to flooding in winter—the expenditure incurred on this viaduct will not appear extravagant. Not only will the viaduct connect the teeming suburbs of Middlesex and Essex, now severed by the Lea marshes, but it will also supply one of the last of the missing links in the North Circular Road which will soon span London in a curve 26 miles long extending from Woolwich Ferry to Kew Bridge, where access is gained to the new Great West Road, 120 feet wide.

Carriage-way Construction.

If we now proceed to consider the construction of carriage-ways in greater detail under the two heads of Foundation and Surfacing, we shall find that the choice of materials for the former is almost entirely dictated by considerations of transport, though there are certain favoured regions where nature herself provides a ready-made foundation of hard compact chalk or rock which need little artificial improvement. On a firm chalk stratum in Kent it suffices in many cases, after preliminary shaping operations, to form a layer of well-compressed clinker to carry the surfacing coat.

Equally serviceable as a natural foundation is a well-drained bed of coarse gravel; finer gravels, and even so fine a material as sand, are not to be despised, provided that the latter has no opportunity of escaping laterally under pressure.

The bearing capacity of clay, loam and other similar subsoils is so diminished by the presence of water that the utmost care should be taken to ensure adequate drainage before road-making operations begin.

The want of uniformity and reliability in the chance supplies of material available for hardcore in areas devoid of quarries has led of late to a notable extension in the use of cement concrete as a road foundation. True, concrete has long been utilised to carry wood blocks and asphalt in City streets, but there is now a growing tendency to adopt it as a foundation, if not as a running surface, for new roads through open country. Unless the road foundation can be relied upon to distribute traffic loads and stresses equally upon the subsoil, the best of road-surfacing methods is doomed to failure.

In the south-eastern portion of England where hitherto, for want of other resources, brick hardcore has largely been used, concrete is increasingly likely to take its place. Hard-core is so nondescript and uncertain a material that it obviously forms a somewhat hazardous foundation for a road designed to endure modern traffic stresses. Demolished buildings, from which hardcore is ordinarily derived, consist of ingredients possessing every degree of hardness from well-vitrified indestructible Stafford blue bricks to the soft pliable "place" bricks often found in internal walls. Mixed with the consignment will be found fragments of hard stone from window sills, soft broken plaster from walls, and refractory lumps of concrete carted from City streets which have recently been broken up. These heterogeneous materials thrown down pell-mell in a layer 12 inches thick, and subsequently crushed under a 10-ton steam roller, form the foundation of most of the roads on the outskirts of London, and it is hardly surprising that, when subjected to modern traffic, roads so constructed wear unequally and show disconcerting signs of weakness. Another disadvantage is the uncertainty of the supply, depending, as it does, on the activities of house-breakers and road-breakers. So uncertain and spasmodic is the output that, when arterial road operations are proceeding on a larger scale, notable difficulty occurs in obtaining deliveries of hardcore, even of doubtful quality.

The arguments in favour of concrete as a road foundation are, of course, less emphatic in regions where large supplies of rock are cheaply available in the immediate neighbourhood of the road-making operations. In such cases the old method practised by Telford of forming a foundation with hand-pitched rubble is likely to hold its own for years to come.

While talking of foundations, reference should be made to the great value on doubtful foundations—loam, clay, &c. —of an underbed 4 inches to 6 inches thick (or even more) of clinker from destructors or gasworks to prevent the plastic subsoil rising between the interstices of the hard-core or pitching.

One of the Greater London arterial roads, the East Ham and Barking bye-pass, consists of a causeway carried across the Thames-side marshes on a bank, 4 feet or 5 feet high, of clinker from the adjoining works of the Gas Light and Coke Company.

Leaving the subject of foundations, I will turn to a few typical methods of surfacing, beginning with the ordinary waterbound macadam, which still remains in wide use on lightly trafficked roads. The surface, although no doubt favoured by horsemen, is not impervious to moisture, and consequently requires more crossfall or camber to throw off the wet than is the case with more waterproof materials. Under the influence of heavy traffic in wet weather, mud is created, and the waterbound macadam road cannot claim a lengthy life. For entirely new roads, however, on a doubtful foundation where a certain amount of unequal subsidence must be anticipated, a substantial coat of waterbound macadam (3 or 4 inches thick) plays a useful part as a provisional and temporary running surface—to be treated subsequently as a base for a permanent coating of a more durable character.

The life of a waterbound macadam road can be extended by the judicious use of surface-dressings such as tar or various bituminous mixtures, which should be applied in warm sunny weather to a thoroughly swept, dry carriageway, the surface of which should then be " gritted " with chippings, fine shingle, or sand. Crude tar should not be used, as it often contains ingredients injurious to fish life; so many complaints were received as to the destructive effect upon fisheries of washings from carelessly tarred roads, that a specification is now issued by the Ministry of Transport prescribing the qualities of tar for use on highways.

Mr. W. J. Hadfield, the city surveyor of Sheffield, estimates that a good waterbound road 6 to 8 yards wide, tar-sprayed or painted, is capable of carrying 400 to 600 tons per day of mixed traffic.

An interesting development of the last year or two is the introduction for use as surface-dressings of various asphaltic or bituminous emulsions which can be applied cold, regardless of the weather.

When the uncertainty of our climate is considered and the shortness of the summer—especially in Scotland—it will be realised what importance attaches to the new range of materials now at the road engineers' disposal. The elimination of boilers, fuel, &c., which have hitherto been necessary, is alone of no small advantage, but the possibility of carrying on work in damp weather, instead of being dependent on sunshine, is of even greater moment. How general has become the use of waterproofing materials by road engineers can be gauged from the fact that in a rural county like Herefordshire the whole of the principal roads received surface treatment last year—a considerable proportion being treated with emulsions of the kind I have described. The county engineer, Mr. G. H. Jack, estimates that the life of waterbound road-surfaces has thus been trebled.

Perpetual watchfulness is necessary on the part of road engineers to determine the exact moment at which a rudimentary but short-lived method of road construction, cheap in first cost, can economically be superseded by a more modern process, higher in first cost but more permanent in character and cheaper in upkeep.

The adoption of tar as a surface-dressing led, not unnaturally, to its use as a binder, to be mixed with materials prior to their application, so that the road crust for its entire thickness might become a cohesive mass. The introduction of this method has enabled materials such as Kentish rag, limestone and slag to be utilised, which would not be suitable for use under the waterbound method.

Slag has the advantage of being entirely free from moisture, and appears to possess a natural affinity for tar, with the result that the manufactured product displays qualities of durability far in excess of what could be expected from the nature of the slag utilised.

Mr. Hadfield, whom I have already quoted, has found tar macadam on a sound foundation to be an economical and satisfactory material for roads 8 yards wide carrying up to 2,500 tons per day, including 80 to 100 'buses.

There is little need to refer to the natural asphalts which have been used for sixty years past, in the streets of great towns, and which still remain in high favour. During the past ten years, however, much research has been devoted to the problem of utilising the valuable properties of asphalts and bitumens in some cheaper form of pavement which could be more widely adopted.

The range of choice is now very wide, e.g., bituminous macadam, grouted macadam, single-coated bituminous carpet, bituminous sand carpet on a bituminous sub-crust, bituminous clinker carpet on a bituminous sub-crust, &c. Within the limits of this Paper it is not possible to quote in detail the specifications adopted for all these varieties of processes. One point is common to them all, viz., the need for securing the greatest possible compactness by the elimination of voids. This can only be achieved by the most elaborate precautions in grading the materials.

It is necessary to determine experimentally the exact proportions of ingredients of varying grades needed to attain the highest degree of density in the resultant mixture.

As an example of the general lines followed by modern practice, I will quote a few particulars from a recent specification for (A) one-coat; and (B) two-coat bituminous clinker surfacing, pointing out in passing that special interest attaches to this process as it enables profitable use to be made of an otherwise almost valueless material—clinker.

(A) The one-coat surfacing is to measure 2 inches in thickness after complete consolidation, and to have a cross-fall or camber of 1 in 50. The mineral aggregate is to consist of well-burnt hard clinker, free from coke, ash, or foreign matter. The bitumen has to comply with certain "penetration" and "solubility" tests. The concrete foundation, after thoroughly cleansing, is painted with a coat of hot bitumen. The clinker aggregate is to be mechanically broken to pass a $\frac{1}{2}$-inch mesh screen, and shall consist of approximately the following proportions of smaller grades:—

Clinker evenly graded, $\frac{1}{2}$ inch to $\frac{1}{8}$ inch		33 per cent.
Clinker passing 10-inch sieve, 20 „ „
„ „ 30 „ „	...	20 „ „
„ „ 40 „ „
„ „ 50 „ „
„ „ 80 „ „ ...	...	5 „ „
„ „ 100 „ „ ...	...	10 „ „
„ „ 200 „ „ ...	...	15 „ „
Soluble bitumen as specified Clause 20		17 „ „
	Total	100 per cent.

The clinker is to be thoroughly dried and heated to a temperature of 300 to 350 degrees Fahrenheit. It shall be mixed in a mechanical mixer with 17 per cent. of soluble bitumen.

After thoroughly mixing, the material is to be delivered on to the road at a temperature of 300 to 350 degrees Fahrenheit and spread with hot rakes to the specified thickness.

Rolling shall immediately follow with a light roller (6 to 7 tons), and as the temperature of the material falls, the rolling is to be continued with a 10 to 12-ton roller until no impression is made upon the road surface, which is subsequently to be dusted over with cement, or other approved filler so that a close compact surface may be formed.

(B) The two-coat surfacing comprises a sub-crust or binder course measuring $1\frac{3}{4}$ inch after consolidation and a wearing surface measuring $1\frac{1}{4}$ inch, total finished thickness 3 inches. For the binder coat the clinker is so graduated as to form a close dense mixture from $\frac{1}{2}$-inch gauge downwards, and 12 per cent. by weight of bitumen is added. The top coat or wearing surface is composed of finer clinker gradiated from $\frac{1}{8}$ inch downwards, with 10 per cent. of Portland cement and 15 per cent. of bitumen added. The process of laying and rolling follows that already described for the single-coat work.

A road-making material now attracting much attention from engineers is cement-concrete, which after gaining a wide vogue in Canada and the United States is now extending its sphere of use in Great Britain. I refer, of course, to the adoption of concrete as a running surface; its use as a foundation for asphalt or wood-blocks has long been an established practice. Special interest attaches to the application of concrete in view of the wide range of materials utilisable as aggregate, as compared with the very uneven geographical distribution of good road-stone supplies. On the other hand, concrete is somewhat handicapped by the lengthy period of setting and "curing," which is requisite before the new surface can be subjected to the strain of traffic. This unavoidable delay is of less moment in the case of entirely new roads than in that of the reconstruction of existing highways, where acute inconvenience is caused to traffic by any lengthy period of closing. It seems not unlikely that this difficulty may be mitigated in future by the use of quick-setting cements, several types of which (ciment fondu, ferro-crete, and other aluminous cements) are now available. As is well known, resort has successfully been had to materials of this class for expediting the construction of concrete foundations in City streets where trade and transit stand to suffer severely by every hour of unnecessary delay.

It cannot be said that standard specifications and practice have yet been evolved in the matter of concrete road construction in this country. There is considerable variety of method. The construction may take the form of one-course work or two-course work, the former consisting of one grade of concrete for the full thickness, while the latter provides two layers of concrete mixed in varying proportion. One-course work is simpler, and avoids the risk of cleavage between two layers of differing consistency. For two-course work economy can be claimed in some instances, on the ground that a poorer concrete can be used for the lower layer. In America great lengths of new concrete highway are now being constructed across tracts of country hitherto unprovided with modern roads. The concrete measures 8 inches to 9 inches in thickness and 18 feet to 21 feet in width, with a scarcely perceptible camber.

In the actual process of laying the concrete, there is also much variety of practice, some engineers preferring to proceed continuously, while others adopt the "alternate bay" system, in which the carriage-way is divided into slabs of uniform length, each extending the full width of the carriage-way. The length of the slab may vary under different specifications between 20 feet and 50 feet. If one numbers the slabs consecutively the odd numbers would be laid first, separated by gaps representing the even numbers; these gaps would not be filled until the odd numbers had completely set. By this means it is hoped to counteract the effects of expansion and contraction, which are the bugbear of the concrete road engineer. The transverse joints separating the slab are sometimes disposed at right angles across the road; in other instances they lie at an angle of 60 degrees or so to the kerb-line, so that the impact of the wheels of the vehicle does not strike any slab simultaneously.

The aggregate, consisting of crushed stone or gravel, should not only be clean but should be well graded in size, so as to reduce the percentage of voids to a minimum. In American practice the specification often prescribes that the stone shall be retained on a screen $\frac{1}{4}$-inch mesh, and pass a screen of $1\frac{1}{2}$-inch mesh. In some a $\frac{3}{8}$-inch mesh is substituted for a $\frac{1}{4}$-inch. Risks of failure in the concrete are greatly reduced by washing the aggregate. The sand, too, must pass a rigorous test for cleanliness, and should be condemned if containing more than 3 per cent. of loam, earth, or clay. The particles of sand should have the largest possible range of size from fine to coarse, but, if only one grade is obtainable, coarse is to be preferred. The water used in mixing the concrete should be reasonably free from alkalis, acids, and vegetable matter. The proportions commonly adopted vary from 1 cement, $1\frac{1}{2}$ sand, and 3 gravel to 1 cement, 2 sand, and 4 gravel. Only a bare sufficiency of water should be added—a very wet mixture encourages voids. Uniformly reliable results are hardly attainable by hand mixing unless a very close degree of supervision is exercised. Far greater confidence can be felt if mechanical mixing plant is adopted. The utmost expedition should be used in placing the newly made concrete in position and consolidating it, for which purpose the use of mechanical tamping and finishing machines is greatly favoured in the United States, where they are found to play an invaluable part in minimising voids. It is often desirable slightly to moisten the sub-grade before depositing the concrete, so as to prevent absorption of water from the concrete.

The precautions to be taken during the setting of the concrete depend largely on the climatic conditions. In moist weather no harm will arise from leaving the green concrete uncovered for a few hours, but in hot sunny weather exposure will lead to the formation of hair cracks. Heavy canvas is often used for protecting the concrete during the first 24 hours of setting. The canvas is then removed, and a layer of earth spread over the surface about 2 inches thick and left there for a fortnight or so.

It is claimed for concrete roads that they form little mud or dust, and therefore need slight scavenging; that the tractive effort is very moderate; that their appearance is not unpleasing, except in blinding sunshine; and that, should traffic increase beyond the bearing capacity of the concrete surface, other materials (such as setts, wood-blocks, or asphalt) can be superimposed, so that benefit is still derived from the original expenditure. Disadvantages alleged against concrete roads, apart from those already specified, are that they are somewhat noisy under traffic, and, owing to their smoothness, are inconvenient for traffic on steep gradients.

For the purpose of indurating the surface of the cement concrete, recourse is sometimes had to two or three applications of a weak solution of silicate of soda.

Where anxiety is felt as to the soundness of the sub-soil on which concrete is laid, and it is accordingly desired to form a slab qualified to serve as a raft or bridge, one or two layers of metal reinforcement are often introduced into the concrete. Such cases are, for instance, the new Dartford-Erith Road across marsh-lands, and the road recently constructed across a "moss" at Manchester. In other cases reinforcement is adopted owing to the fact that the thickness of the concrete has had for various reasons to be reduced, and it is necessary to compensate for this reduction by conferring additional strength upon the concrete.

There are large numbers of fabrics in use, expanded metal of 6 inches and other meshes, woven wire, mesh fabrics in which the main tension wires of drawn mild steel run longitudinally with cross-wires welded thereto at regular intervals; other systems make use of twisted or vertical bars; double reinforcement is frequently used in "mattress" form, the upper and lower layers being connected by diagonal members.

The weight of reinforcement varies in ordinary practice from 5 lb. to 25 lb. per yard superficial of concrete foundation.

Stages of Progress.

Much of the work planned by road engineers of to-day can be achieved only by stages extending over a lengthy period. Indeed, I suspect that the most valuable projects are those requiring several years for their realisation. Town planning procedure is being generally applied for this purpose. As an instance of these slow-growing schemes might be mentioned the suggested North Orbital Road sweeping round through the Home Counties from Tilbury to Slough in a curve 75 miles long, and so connecting the outer suburbs or satellite towns of the yet Greater London that is to be.

For a great part of the distance use can be made of existing roads which will merely need widening, and realigning. Wide gaps have, however, to be filled at various points, streams and railways bridged, thickset towns and villages avoided. It appears likely that for its entire length through Hertfordshire the line of this road will be embodied in town planning schemes, so as to ensure its formation as building estates develop. With this example before them, other local authorities may feel disposed to adopt similar measures, so that eventually the North Orbital Road may come into being by piecemeal growth. The shapelessness and incoherence that characterise the present suburbs of London would be less likely to afflict the outer ring if a few boldly outstanding features such as this were deliberately laid down long before the ploughman resigns the field to the bricklayers.

The essential point is that sufficient land should be reserved to give the road some distinguishing qualities apart from mere convenience of transit. It is well worth considering whether the estate-owner and the local authority would not both stand to gain materially and substantially by treating stretches of such new routes as a parkway embellished with avenues of trees, shrubberies and lawns which would confer upon the neighbourhood the distinctive character which is so sadly lacking in the average residential suburb. The road-maker needs allies among those who control the land and landscape adjoining new highways, so that the traveller may not only reach his destination speedily and safely, but may have reason to admire the surroundings of the road as much as its surface.

SURVEYORS' INSTITUTION

SESSION 1925-1926.

AT THE ORDINARY GENERAL MEETING

Held on Monday, 7th December, 1925,

A DISCUSSION took place on a Paper entitled

MODERN METHODS OF ROAD-MAKING,

By C. Herbert Bressey, C.B.E. (Fellow).

Mr. JOHN D. WALLIS (President), in the Chair.

Before the reading of the Paper, the PRESIDENT said that the present was the first meeting of the members of The Surveyors' Institution held since the lamented death of Her late Majesty the Queen-Mother, Queen Alexandra. On the occasion of the death of Queen Victoria, and also on the occasion of the death of King Edward, the members of The Surveyors' Institution presented to the King an Address expressing their sympathy and regret. As the King was the Patron of The Institution, he would ask the meeting that night to agree with him in presenting to the King an Address which he would ask the Secretary to read.

The SECRETARY then read the Address, which was as follows:—

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

THE HUMBLE ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, COUNCIL, AND MEMBERS OF THE SURVEYORS' INSTITUTION.

WE, the President, Council, and Members of The Surveyors' Institution, in General Meeting assembled, beg respectfully to tender to your Majesty an expression of our heartfelt grief at the overwhelming loss which has been sustained by this Nation and Empire in the death of your Majesty's gracious mother, Queen Alexandra, who during the many years of her residence in this country had endeared herself to every class of your people by her beneficence, her sympathy with others, and her desire to further every good cause.

The noble example of devotion to the service of the people afforded by her life will ever remain in the affectionate memory of your subjects.

While thus expressing to your Majesty and the Royal Family our respectful sympathy in their irreparable loss, we desire to offer an assurance of our loyalty and attachment to your Majesty's person."

The assent of members present was given to the Address by all standing in respectful silence.

Mr. L. J. Veit (Fellow) said it gave him much pleasure to propose a hearty vote of thanks to Colonel Bressey for his most interesting Paper. He was sure the sympathy of all the members would go out to Colonel Bressey in having to deliver such an address in the trying circumstances as to health in which he found himself that evening.

Speaking as a municipal engineer, as well as a surveyor, it had afforded him great pleasure to be present that evening and to hear the Paper, because municipal engineers came in contact to a large extent with officials of the Ministry. In the opening paragraph of the Paper it was stated that the Ministry worked in close and cordial relationship with all the engineers in the country, and speaking personally he believed that that would be endorsed by the members of their profession. It was really a pleasure to work with a department such as the Ministry. He said that because one sometimes heard public departments abused, but in the present case he had nothing but praise for the Ministry.

After hearing what the author had to say, and seeing the very interesting slides which he showed, one realised the immense amount of work the Ministry was now carrying on in conjunction with the various local authorities; and one recognised the necessity for it when one saw the enormous amount of traffic which was now using the roads, and remembered the great increase of traffic which had taken place during the past few years. Taking those things into account, it was almost impossible to imagine that roads could be made too wide or too straight.

The Paper had dealt chiefly with arterial roads, and, of course, they were very necessary for connecting up the various great centres, for straightening out the existing roads, and forming new ones, such as the Great West Road near London. Personally his own experience was in City work, and in Westminster they experienced all the difficulties with regard to traffic in a concentrated form. He had been particularly interested to see a photograph of a street in the City showing the enormous conglomeration of mains under the surface of the road. The Ministry were no doubt taking a wise course in making the new roadways wide, and in making provision for future mains and surfaces. Those underground services provided one of the chief difficultie that were being experienced in London now from a traffic point of view. In some cases even the undertakers themselves were not sure where some of the services were situated, and they provided a most difficult problem to deal with. In Westminster there were twelve separate undertakers who had the power to open up the roads, and the local authority nearly always got the blame for it, whereas it had not the power to prevent it. The Ministry were trying to arrange for some of that work to be expedited and carried out at week-ends, and various other arrangements were being made to facilitate traffic; but, as far as central London was concerned, the traffic had outgrown the streets altogether, and the cost of improvements was so great that it was impossible to keep pace with it.

Westminster was carrying out a small improvement now in Berkeley Street. It was quite a minor affair, but the cost was something like £100,000 for the purchasing of the necessary land for the widening, including the cost of the street works. A subway was also to be provided in Trafalgar Square, and the cost of that would be about £35,000, of which some £12,000 had to be spent in diverting mains in order to get the subway through. It was most important that provision should be made in the case of new highways for mains and services. They should not be allowed to be placed under the carriage-way, but should be under the footway. That meant that there must be duplicate services, but it did away with the great difficulty of the constant breaking up of the roadway, which cost a great deal of money apart from its inconvenience. He had been interested to look up some costs a short time ago on that subject. The cost of repaving a road at Charing Cross in 1914 was 12*s.* 6*d.* a super yard, but to-day the same work cost 30*s.* a yard. There were various causes for that, of which one was the increase in the cost of labour and material, but another was that roads now had to be on a much stronger foundation. The old foundation nearly always had to come out. In the old days, moreover, the work had not to be done so rapidly, whereas now it had to be done very often during the night as well as by day, and more expensive cements had to be used. He had used a good deal of ferrocrete and ciment fondu, and had found them very valuable. Ferrocrete cost only 10*s.* a ton more than ordinary cement, so that it paid for itself over and over again in work where speed was necessary.

He saw quite a number of his brother engineers present, and he was sure they would have much that was interesting to say on the Paper, and he would conclude, therefore, again expressing on behalf of The Institution its gratitude to the author.

Mr. P. J. Waldram (Fellow) said that in complying, at short notice, with a request to second the vote of thanks he was conscious of his inability to do so properly. A vote of thanks for a Paper such as that which had been presented that evening should be proposed and seconded in the most felicitous terms, but he was sure that what he lacked in eloquence the members would make up in warmth.

The author prefaced his excellent Paper with the statement that he was largely a spectator. If that were taken in its ordinary sense, and in the sense in which the author, in his modesty, would possibly desire it to be taken, he thought it was little short of a libel on a well-known and extremely energetic official, and it might even be necessary to ask the author to tender an abject apology to the chief engineer of the Roads Department.

It had once, when he was a temporary civil servant, been his singular good fortune to be deputed to meet the author by a department which was very angry indeed with the Roads Department. The matter was extremely complicated, and had all the makings of very pretty inter-departmental squabble, which would have wasted a good deal of time and public money. The author would probably tell them that he had forgotten the incident altogether. If so, that would be because it was so quickly dealt with. At the first interview the author speedily organised a conference of all the interests involved. They all attended, each representative armed with the requisite amount of paper and minutes, and fully primed for a bitter fight for that particular part of the public service for which he was responsible. Under Colonel Bressey's able guidance, however, the conference was over quickly, and they all went away with a thoroughly good working scheme whereby everyone was able to get on with his particular job without interfering with anybody else. That was not the work of a mere spectator. The author might be said to be a spectator in the sense that the executive head of any big and active concern ought to be a spectator, free to keep a watchful eye on all the activities, small or great, of his department, undistracted by the constant necessity of making good the defects or correcting the mistakes of subordinate officers who had either been chosen carelessly in the first instance, or who had subsequently been controlled without that combination of firmness and tact which was essential to the efficient working of any great concern. He was a spectator in the same way that the chief engineer of a liner at sea or a commander of troops in the field was a spectator—a spectator whose vigilance must never relax, a spectator who must have eyes at the back of his head. In that sense he was a spectator, but in that sense alone.

The author had presented a most interesting and informative Paper, for which The Institution was greatly indebted to him. If their gratitude took the not uncommon form of asking, perhaps greedily, for more, he trusted that the author, as their intellectual host, would recognise that their appetites had been whetted by the excellent fare which he had provided.

What he thought was perhaps lacking in the Paper, otherwise so comprehensive, was any information as to the loads which roads of different classes should be designed to carry, and the materials and methods of construction which were considered suitable for each particular case. Speaking as a bridge designer—or possibly he ought to say as one who had now insufficient time for structural problems and data—he would prefer such information in the form of axle loads and wheel spacing for different classes of traffic. But surveyors and architects often needed it in that form when they were called upon to design bridges of sorts to carry traffic both in town or country. Any information which the author could, in replying to the discussion, give on that important point would, he thought, be extremely valuable. Doubtless the information was in the hands of the author's department, but published data on that most important point was extremely meagre and largely out of date.

With regard to the treatment of roads by tar emulsion, that also was a subject of the greatest interest to surveyors. If the author could, in reply to the discussion, expand his somewhat brief treatment of it by an expert opinion of its value, durability, and cost, he would have added considerably to his claims on the gratitude of the members. If all that was claimed for tar emulsion were even partially justified by performance, it should form a most valuable preservative of road surfaces in situations where the cost of tar macadam or even of tar spraying would be absolutely prohibitive. The entry of moisture into the material of a road surface not only aided disintegration and the formation of mud under traffic, it also tended to create violent disintegration in frosty weather. Unfortunately moisture entered road surfaces as it entered walls, mainly by capillary attraction. The denser the material used, the smaller were the interstices, and the more powerful was the capillary attraction. In walls, London stock bricks with large pores, and concrete blocks deliberately honeycombed with small air-holes, were much drier than dense Fletton bricks and close-grained cement rendering because of the greater capillary action of the more minute interstices. But it was claimed that when the walls of interstices were coated with a thin film of tar, asphaltic or bituminous emulsion, the capillary process was reversed by the interesting phenomenon known as "surface tension," and entering moisture was physically expelled instead of being powerfully drawn in. That opened up great possibilities, not only in road work but also in building, particularly cottage building. If those emulsions had proved a cheap waterproofing material for road surfaces, then they might be even more useful for waterproofing block concrete walls and Fletton brickwork. The claims as to efficiency certainly seemed to be made out. Perhaps the author could give some information as to first cost and particularly as to durability and renewals of road surfaces.

If he had not already occupied too much time, he would like to ask the author how the 10 per cent. of Portland cement in the top coat referred to in the Paper was applied. Was it mixed with the fine clinker dry or wet, or merely dusted over the road surface after rolling ?

There were many much more able speakers than himself in the room who would, he was sure, add their thanks to the author in better terms than he himself could express them, but he would like to assure Colonel Bressey that no one could thank him more heartily than he did, and he had far more than the usual conventional pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks.

Mr. Rees Jeffreys (Visitor) wished to associate himself with all the preceding speakers had said in praise of the author and his work. As to Colonel Bressey describing himself as a "spectator," he thought the Road Department of the Ministry were carrying on the traditions of the Road Board which preceded them. They recognised that their business was to help the highway authorities of this country to do their job, and not to do it for them. They realised that they could best secure that result by winning the confidence of the local authorities and effacing themselves. The Ministry of Transport was to be congratulated on its chief engineer, and the local authorities of this country were to be congratulated that the Ministry of Transport had such a chief engineer.

Some of the opening remarks of the Paper had caused him to look up something he himself wrote about roads a good many years ago. He had discovered a manuscript where he had written down his idea of the purpose of the road. It read as follows: "Roads exist to enable travellers " to pass in safety and comfort and without obstruction in " the quickest possible time, from place to place, and under " conditions which will enable them to appreciate anything " of beauty in the architecture and lay-out of the towns, and " all that there is of beauty in the English country-side."

He had written that thirty years ago, and the underlying ideas were clear—speed, beauty, safety, and comfort. He was afraid he must apologise for those ideas. He was very young, very enthusiastic and very inexperienced at the time; and when he came to deal with the problems of road work in practice he found that quite other ideas obtained. There were, for example, the representatives of the statutory undertakings, of whom something had been heard that evening. They seemed to regard the road primarily as a place under which to lay pipes. The illustrations which the author had shown on the screen that evening emphasised what was pointed out in the Paper, namely, that with a 100-ft. road the undertakers were not satisfied even with 50 feet in which to accommodate their subterranean communications. He understood that his friend Mr. Dryland at a recent conference suggested that some of those things might be carried under the front gardens and on private property. That idea was worth exploring, and he hoped Mr. Dryland would develop it. He was sure the members of The Institution would be in a position to give him great assistance in that direction.

So much for pipes. Then he met the tramway interests, and he found the tramway engineers and the tramway authorities, and, in particular, the Corporation of Glasgow and the London County Council, seemed to regard the roads as a place on which to lay tramlines. In the case of London, the London County Council also seemed to think that bridges existed primarily to carry tramways. To see the idea in operation let them go and look at Putney Bridge, or read about it in recent reports concerning Waterloo Bridge. There was one excuse for the London County Council, namely, that it was not a traffic authority or a road authority, and therefore it could say it was not called on to look at the problem from the road point of view.

Then he found that some of the London borough councils seemed to regard the roads as a proper place in which to erect public conveniences. He was told the worst example of that sort of thing was to be seen at the junction of Rochester Row and the Vauxhall Bridge Road. As the distinguished engineer of the City of Westminster was present that evening, he would like to hear what was to be said from his point of view.

Then the Post Office regarded the road as a thing by the side of which they could erect telegraph poles, and underneath which they could put telephone wires. If one travelled from London to Brighton or from London to Scotland one found that for a great part of the distance one went between serried rows of telegraph poles placed on both sides of the road so close to the macadam roadway that, if one was unfortunate enough to skid, one would be lucky to escape a broken skull.

Children looked on the road as their playground. An asphalt road was a very good place for roller-skating, and the girls liked to play hop-scotch on it. They had every justification for doing that, in view of the fact that they were excluded from the proper school playgrounds on Saturdays and Sundays, the days when they needed them most.

He could go on multiplying such examples, and instance the view of the farmer and the small tradesman, and other people who had their own ideas as to the purposes for which the road existed, all of which were hostile to the ideas with which he himself had started. The question he would like to ask was whether any advance had been made since he wrote the lines he had quoted towards the realisation of his young ideal. In some respects he thought an advance had been made. To take the question of comfort; when he wrote that paragraph the roads of England were exceedingly dusty. Some of the present generation had, he thought, forgotten what the roads were like, but Sir Henry Maybury, Mr. Dryland, Mr. Chapman, and others, had set about to solve that problem, and about twenty or more years ago organised the tar trials as a result of which the roads in this country had been made dustless. That, he thought, was a great achievement. There had been great progress in comfort. He was told that some people wished to create a social revolution in this country. They would not do it by the "red flag" or the "black shirt," but he thought if anyone really wanted to bring about a social revolution in this country, they should divert the Road Fund, and induce the county councils to go back to the road-making methods of twenty-five years ago. He was quite sure the people of this country would rise in revolution if they once more had to put up with the flint roads of Kent, the oolite roads of Derbyshire, or the limestone roads of Somerset.

Progress had also been made in the direction of creating new roads. To suggest new roads twenty years ago was to preach without much hope of converting anybody; but the illustrations which the author had shown on the screen that evening demonstrated what was being done at the present time in the matter of new roads. They were a bit patchy, and somewhat incomplete. Roads in Greater London were being left with very ragged ends, especially on the London side. He was anxious to know how they were going to be carried further into London. The Sutton By-pass, for example, finished mid-way between Sutton and Mitcham, and he would like to know how that was going to be carried on to join up with the Clapham and Brixton roads. Taking the Great West Road and the Southend Road, one on the west side and one on the east, somehow or other those roads had got to be joined up so that the east and the west could be linked together. That presented a very big problem. The author had illustrated on the screen one example, and a very practical example of the difficulties of the problem. He had shown how Watling Street ended in Strood, and he said that the question of getting round Strood, Rochester and Chatham sooner or later would have to be faced. Similar problems would have to be faced elsewhere.

Twenty years ago he had preached the gospel of the dustless road. That had been realised. Ten years ago he had preached the gospel of new roads, and that was in process of being realised. There was another gospel, however, on which he would like to lay emphasis that day, and that was "Beauty on the Roads." A great deal more could be done to make the roads of this country beautiful and attractive. One wanted to make them really ways of pleasantness. There was so much of beauty, both in the private parks and gardens that lay alongside the road, and in the natural beauty of the landscape which was now hidden from the users of roads by high hedges and other obstructions, and which could be laid open to the public view. He thought that beauty could be revealed to those who used the roads with very little expenditure, if people would only co-operate and get it done. He was glad to think that in the present Minister of Transport, Colonel Ashley, they had a statesman who was very sympathetic with that idea. When he introduced his Road Improvement Bill last year he dwelt on the desirability of planting trees and increasing the attractiveness of the public roads. He (the speaker) thought a lot could be done to make roads beautiful by the members of The Institution, who exercised great influence since they had the power of advising those with whom decisions rested.

Mr. A. Dryland (Visitor) heartily associated himself with the remarks of previous speakers with regard to the Paper, and expressed his regret that the author had had to leave the meeting, because in discussions it was helpful to face the person at whom one was firing one's shots, and it somewhat detracted from the feeling of a discussion if the person who started it was not present during its continuance.

He intended only to call attention to a very few points in the Paper, and the first point to which he would like to refer was the author's remarks about camber. The author advocated a camber of one in 48 and one in 50. He thought possibly he might like to qualify that with regard to the nature of the surface, because plastic materials, unless they were being laid on a very true foundation, could not be laid on those cambers and yet retain their shape and keep free from water. He had found in adapting old foundations, such as old macadam roads, for plastic purposes, that one could not get a workable camber much flatter than 1 in 36, though with concrete foundations one might get a camber as low as 1 in 48. 1 in 36 was quite a good camber for all practical purposes. No one could complain of such a camber as that; motorists were travelling over a good many roads to-day where the camber was half as much again as that, and they did not experience the slightest discomfort or danger.

With regard to the dimensions of arterial roads, 100 feet seemed to be very generally accepted as the proper width, but he was not at all sure that that was right. It did not seem to divide up properly. Personally he thought that rather more than 100 feet was wanted, particularly when one had regard to such facts as had been mentioned that evening by the author, as to the amount of space which was taken up by the underground uses of highways. Either the footways must be very wide, so as to allow of the underground communications being placed under them, or verges must be provided entirely for those communications, or, as he had suggested at another meeting, they must be kept off the road altogether, which was a thing much to be desired from the roadmaker's point of view. He had ventured at a meeting a week or two ago to suggest that there were other places for mains besides the carriage-way of main roads, and he had put forward the idea that they might sometimes be carried along the backs of the houses instead of the front, or through the front gardens of houses instead of the roadways. In that case they would not be subjected to any traffic stresses, and it would be much cheaper to lay them and get at them when required, because the cost of getting at those mains and making good the road afterwards must be enormous for the undertakers.

To revert to the question of width, particularly with regard to the carriage-way, he thought there was considerable doubt whether very wide carriage-ways were altogether safe. One had only to travel on the Great West Road on a busy morning to see people scorching along seven or eight abreast, and if someone was coming in the opposite direction one saw confusion and realised that it was possible to give people too much room for their own safety, unless driving was very careful. He was inclined to think the double carriage-way—the up and down system—would be the one which would have to be adopted eventually in the case of all great roadways, so that the traffic was segregated according to its direction. So many people were on the roads to-day who were not skilled drivers, and so many more would come on them in the future who were not too expert at navigating the roads, that he thought they would have to be kept in limited channels for their own safety.

The author's suggestion of a double-decked street was very attractive, but he thought it was rather premature. It would be very convenient to have the numerous underground workings accessible from below, but the cost of it would be very great, and it was not likely to be adopted except in the case of newly constructed streets in populous cities.

Referring again to the question of width, the author had mentioned that what was aimed at was 60 feet for country arterial roads. There, again, he did not know whether 60 feet was quite enough. It generally resolved itself into a 40-ft. carriage-way with two 10-ft. footways, and if the mains were to be carried under them, 10-ft. footways might not be wide enough. He had been struck to find that in America the old turnpike principle of the road being 66 feet wide was the standard, and he thought that extra 6 feet would be very useful in the case of roads in this country.

The author had also referred to concrete roads. Difficulties with concrete in this country seemed greater than they were in the United States, although at first sight one would have thought that climatic conditions in America would be more detrimental. He thought the distinction was that changes of climate in America were very much more severe, but they were also very much less frequent, and it was the continual change of temperature and change of atmosphere in this country which caused our difficulties. He did not think it was often realised how extensive were the movements of the subsoil of our roads according to the temperature and the amount of water in them. It was well known that roads on clay subsoil lifted from 1 to 2 inches, and even up to 4 inches in the winter time, and if one thought about that one must realise that there were other strains upon a road than the traffic strains, and strains far more destructive—strains from the natural forces. On the clay subsoil in north and west Middlesex, for example, it was found extremely difficult to keep the roads stable owing to the expansion and contraction of the clay. The old hard-core foundation had been abandoned because it was found that it was pushed about so much under the present heavy traffic, and it was impossible to get an even surface with it.

The author had shown on the screen some concrete roads which were laid in alternate bays. He had tried that method because it was found that the cracking when the roads were laid in longer units was very noticeable and to some extent detrimental, but the alternate bay system did not solve the problem because it brought difficulties of its own. On clay soils, when the first bay had been laid, the bays between lifted so as not to allow the necessary depth to lay the second bay. It was also found that, in setting, the concrete tended to warp towards the joints, and in travelling over those roads one was apt to get an oscillating motion which was not desirable. He did not himself anticipate that concrete-surfaced roads would answer the purpose of carrying the present degree of traffic for a large number of years. They might for some few years, but after that they would have to become the foundation for some other and more durable surface material.

One criticism of the author's specification of clinker asphalt which he would like to make was that he thought it would be an advantage to provide a larger grade of material to provide a less slippery surface. After all, the slippery portion of the surface was in the bitumen, and the more one could divide up that bitumen by using larger units, the less slipperiness there was likely to be.

Mr. J. P. Rhys (Professional Associate) said that as a representative, though a very humble one, of the other great transport concern in this country, he felt a certain amount of diffidence in speaking before so many of his more brilliant and experienced professional brothers, but his excuse must be that, in the course of his life, he had had on several occasions to meet officials of the Ministry of Transport, and he felt sure that the nice things which had been said about the author were by no means excessive and would apply to many of his colleagues. His first and most interesting meeting with them had been one winter about nine years ago, in the war time, when he was contending with the problem of laying a road which would carry the excessive and continual traffic of lorries going up the line without any concrete or any of the modern means of road-making. All that was available was load after load of macadam, and the bottoming on which it had to be laid was fragmentary and soft to a degree. However, a system was initiated somewhat similar to the concrete curb, which was laid in all the modern arterial roads. In other words, pit props of rather small diameter were laid longitudinally along both sides of the road, and pegged in with a couple of pegs of similar material behind each. That prevented the road squeezing out and forming a gully instead of retaining its original camber.

Although one viewed the road developments now taking place in this country with tremendous satisfaction, they had brought him personally a considerable amount of extra work, but it was of a peculiarly interesting type, and it seemed to him that if the proposal to lay mains through people's front or back gardens were put into practice, surveyors would get a good deal more work, and he could see surveyors who acted on behalf of private claimants somewhat inclined to rub their hands over the proposal. He thought it might be an excellent thing from their point of view.

A somewhat ghoulish tendency had led him to look at some statistics dealing with the accidents on roads, because at one time he lived on an arterial road, and what struck him most was the regular Sunday accident outside his front gate. He found that in 1914 the number of fatal accidents on the roads was about 2,000, whereas last year, 1924, it was about 4,000. That was no criticism of road-making; it was a criticism of the people who used the roads, and there was not the slightest doubt that in the formulation of schemes for the construction of new roads the utmost effort had been made to provide a road which would be foolproof. That was a very important thing, not only from the point of view of the fool, but from the point of view of other people who used the road. Personally he preferred taking the train when he wanted to go anywhere; on the road he was always in a state of fear unless he was behind a horse.

He noticed that Colonel Ashley, in speaking the other day, had said he hoped local authorities would make use of the provisions of the Roads Improvement Act to plant trees and grass verges alongside the roads. It was interesting to notice that that expenditure would apparently come under a heading that would enable it to rank for a grant from the Road Fund, and he imagined that that would result in many councils doing that sort of thing who might not otherwise have been willing to bear the expense. There were certain other provisions in the Roads Improvement Act which he thought were just as interesting. In several ways it was an Act which was rather out of the ordinary, but the thing that struck him most was the provision for giving notice to owners and occupiers for the regulation of hedges, fences, &c., at dangerous points and in the vicinity of corners. They could be required not only to alter existing ones, but to regulate the growth and construction of those in future. That was no doubt a very valuable provision.

There were two other provisions which were both interesting and valuable. One was with regard to the prescription of building lines, and the other for the carrying out of experiments on roads. He felt sure many road engineers who were at work on that problem would agree that the perfect road surface had by no means yet been discovered; it was a thing still to be found.

He would like to say how greatly he had enjoyed the slides which the author had shown on the screen. One felt that a man who had, like the author, got up from a sick bed, or at least from a chair of sickness, to come on an evening like the present one and put up so good a show, was a very fine fellow indeed.

Mr. W. P. Robinson (Visitor) said it gave him great pleasure to be present as a visitor that evening, and he thanked The Institution very warmly for the privilege of being allowed to listen to so interesting and admirable a Paper. The author was to be congratulated on the idea of illustrating road works by means of aerial photographs; it made him wish he could do the same with his council instead of having to present them with plans.

There were one or two points in the Paper on which he would like to comment. Other speakers had referred to the author being a "spectator." Personally that rather made him feel like one of the players in a Rugby match—that he was receiving all the knocks, not from the author but from the public, who were very apt to criticise the work of highway engineers, particularly during the weather conditions which had been experienced for the past fortnight.

He had been interested to hear Mr. Dryland mention the question of camber, but was rather surprised to hear him urge the use of a bigger camber than that advocated in the Paper, because personally he would suggest the desirability of reducing the camber to about 1 in 70 in the case of the modern impervious roads; he thought that was advisable from the point of view of obviating skidding. A good many skids were, he believed, due to excessive camber, especially on curves where the camber was the reverse way to that which it ought to be.

The author had been kind enough to refer to a particular piece of work with which he himself had been connected—a concrete construction at Dorking. He heard there were rumours floating about to the effect that that road had gone to pieces, and therefore he thought it was only right to say, in the interests of concrete road construction in this country, that the road was as good to-day as it was when it was put down three years ago.

Mr. Dryland also referred to the width of roads. He would like to ask the author what he considered to be the limit in width for a single carriage-way. He believed Mr. Dryland had gone to 50 feet in the case of the Great West Road, but he had rather hinted that evening that that was too wide. It would be interesting, therefore, if the author would state his ideas on the subject—whether it should be 30 feet or 40 feet, or more. On the subject of width, when one heard certain people nowadays arguing that the roads were being made too wide, it was rather striking to look back two hundred years and think of the widths that were allowed by Parliament in those days—sometimes as much as 80 feet. One realised to-day the benefits which were derived from those large widths laid down under the Turnpike Acts.

The author said that in the case of new road construction, where the road had to be carried on embankments 4 or 5 feet in height, it was customary to employ temporary surfacing material for the construction of the road surface until such time as the bank was consolidated. Personally he had been able to break away from that tradition, and had constructed his permanent surface on embankments as much as 10 or 15 feet high immediately he had finished them. He had to thank concrete for the success he had met with in that respect, and also the modern plant which he used now for road-making, such as caterpillar tractors for consolidating the fills. That was a great advantage over the old-fashioned system of consolidating a newly made bank, one obtained uniform consolidation, and therefore uniform settlement. With reinforced concrete on the top of a bank which was uniform in settlement, one was much more likely to get uniform settlement of the road surface than with a temporary surfacing of hard-core.

The only defect he had found in the concrete road which had been down for three years was slight air cracks which were due to uneven settlement. He had been astonished to find that on the Kingston By-pass Road one of the bays of concrete had been distorted as much as 10 inches without breaking up. He did submit, therefore, from the little experience he had had of that type of construction on newly filled banks, that ultimately it was much cheaper than putting down a temporary surface.

He did not want it to be assumed that he was an advocate of concrete roads as against other forms of construction, but in the particular case he had mentioned in Surrey it had been necessary to use concrete because of the lack of other suitable materials, and it was the cheapest form of construction for a new road. He certainly agreed with the author that the hard-core, so far as modern methods of road construction were concerned, was almost a thing of the past. Even where it was used for roads carrying lighter traffic, he submitted that it should have its voids filled with some sort of binding agent rather than that they should be left to be filled by the process of traffic consolidation. It could be done with cement, or a weak mixture of cement and sand.

He also agreed with Mr. Dryland with regard to the size of the aggregate in the clinker asphalt specification. He thought a very good rule to work to was that the aggregate should be of such size that the largest piece was about half the thickness of the crust; for a 2-inch carpet there should be a maximum of 1 inch in the aggregate. He would also like to point out that in the specification submitted by the author 17 per cent. of soluble bitumen was provided for. Personally he worked to somewhere about 11 or 12 per cent. in order to prevent, if possible, the surplus bitumen being squeezed out on to the surface of the roads, because he believed that very largely resulted in the complaint which was being received as to skidding.

The author also referred to methods of laying concrete roads, and instanced the case of where two courses of different strengths were used, and said that a poor concrete could be used in the lower layer. He had laid a considerable quantity of two-course pavement, and it had the advantage that one could not only use a weaker concrete in the lower layer, but could also use less expensive material. Where the sand would not be clean enough for a one-course pavement, it would be sufficiently clean for the lower course of a two-course pavement.

The author also referred to the angle of the joints with regard to concrete roads, and said that in some cases an angle of 90 degrees and in others an angle of 60 degrees was employed. Personally he thought that to put the joint at right angles was very undesirable, because one got the axle of the vehicle parallel to the joint; the joint was struck by both wheels at once, whereas with an angle of 60 degrees that did not occur, and the wheels struck it one after the other. He thought there was more in it than appeared to the eye. A joint at right angles was at right angles to the pressure caused by the expansion of the concrete, whereas with an angle of 60 degrees it tended to direct the pressure towards the side of the road instead of along the road, thereby lessening the tendency to bulge with expansion. He had had no trouble at all through expansion of concrete roads where the joints were at 60 degrees.

The author also referred to one great disadvantage of concrete roads, namely, their smoothness on gradients. Personally he would like to see the Ministry try the experiment of putting a concrete road on a gradient with a large aggregate of 2-inch stone on the surface, so as to leave what looked like a macadam surface. To his mind the very valuable powers which had been given to the Ministry by the Roads Improvement Act should be made full use of, and he urged that the Ministry should exercise their powers of making experiments in such ways as that as soon as possible. There were many authorities who were experimenting individually, but that led to a waste of public money.

Mr. O. Cattlin (Professional Associate) said many of the speakers had not traversed the Paper at all, but had given Papers on roads. Personally he wished to corroborate what the author had said as to the harmonious and cordial relations which existed with the Ministry, and he very much appreciated the valuable Paper which the author had presented. So much attention had been given to road-making of late that people like himself, who had been engaged in maintenance and repair work for a great many years, felt strongly inclined to express their opinions. Some of the views put forward in the Press made him feel that it was desirable they should do so.

He was not entitled, perhaps, to say much about arterial roads, because he was only a poor metropolitan surveyor, but he would like to repeat the opinion he had expressed elsewhere, that too much money had been devoted to such work instead of being used for widening existing highways. He thought the latter work should have been dealt with first. The traffic on those old highways had been exaggerated somewhat. He had taken traffic records himself for many years, and he thought it was only the week-end traffic which affected the county main roads, although he spoke with due deference to the many county surveyors present.

With regard to the provision of subways for pipes underneath the new roads, if that was going to hold up improvement it would be better to employ grass verges for the mains so as not to disturb the carriage-way, but it was not advisable to be too antagonistic to the statutory undertaker. It must not be forgotten that what the statutory undertaker supplied was just as essential to the public as the road itself, and therefore the situation had to be faced as it was, and a suitable scheme provided for accommodating such public services. Personally he deprecated very much the attack on those people who supplied electricity, water, gas, and so on. The double-decked roadway described by the author was a very old idea, and, as Mr. Dryland had said, was very attractive, but for the present, at any rate, it was too expensive.

With regard to road widening, the London-Oxford widening scheme appealed to him very strongly. He thought that that was the type of thing that should be done. The system might be extended by having avoiding roads round towns. It was probably common knowledge that the necessary fund for the purchase of buildings in congested town streets could not be provided at the present time, and therefore the prolongation of the new wide roads into the town was prevented.

The author had said something as to details of construction, and he thought it would be desirable to get further information from him in that regard as to the view of the Ministry. He thought it would be useful to obtain information as to the bearing power of the subsoils to which the author referred. Reliable statistics on that head should be published as soon as possible. With regard to hard-core, he thought most people had realised for many years past that hard-core was entirely unreliable for putting a permanent pavement on; it had got to consolidate, and the voids had to be filled. He had been resident engineer on the work on British Museum Avenue, north of the British Museum, in 1910-1912. There was a considerable depth of hard-core filling, and a so-called temporary pavement of tarred macadam was put on top of that, which lasted for a good many years without much deformation.

Speaking in the presence of Mr. Robinson he would like to say he had admired the Dorking-Reigate Road very much. It seemed to him a natural and suitable form of road to adopt in the counties. Hard-core must be very costly in such situations, but on a good substantial subsoil which was well drained one could very well put down a concrete road. With regard to the specification which had been given for concrete roads, it would seem that it was by no means certain that finality had been arrived at. There was a feeling of uneasiness about the whole matter. On the other hand a good result could be obtained, as, for example, in the case of the road to which Mr. Robinson had referred, and he suggested county main roads should be constructed on the concrete principle if funds permitted, with the possibility of covering them with some other material at a later date, should that be found necessary. He would also like to ask the author if he could give approved specifications for bituminous work. He had in his possession an old copy of the specifications of the city of Brooklyn, where specifications for bituminous work were very carefully set out. He thought the Ministry of Transport should provide something of that sort quite soon. Bituminous material was undoubtedly a very useful class of paving, and although it might become distorted during certain classes of weather, there was a very useful field open to it.

In conclusion, he had much pleasure in adding his thanks to those which other speakers had expressed to the author for his admirable Paper.

The vote of thanks was then put by the PRESIDENT, and carried with acclamation.

The proceedings then terminated.

Colonel BRESSEY has sent the following written reply to the discussion on his Paper:—

Mr. Waldram enquires what load the different classes of roads should be designed to carry.

So long as the King's highway remains open to every class of traffic indiscriminately, it will be very difficult to formulate a scale of loads. The most insignificant rural lane may have to carry the heaviest types of traction engine.

With regard to the use of asphaltic and bituminous emulsions for surface-dressing, I hope that some of the county surveyors will give particulars of cost and durability as soon as a sufficient fund of experience has been accumulated. Use is made of Portland cement in bituminous sur facing operations as a "filler," i.e., to fill the finest voids in the mixture. It is incorporated with the other ingredients before laying.

Mr. Rees Jeffreys refers to the "ragged ends" of the Greater London arterial roads. He is anxious to find the divinity that will "shape our ends, rough hew them as "we may." One may hope that town planning procedure will smooth off some of the rough edges, and one may be sure that the London County Council is fully alive to the need for the forging of links to couple up the new roads across Inner London.

Mr. A. Dryland and Mr. W. P. Robinson express divergent views as to the camber of carriage-ways. They will both, however, agree that no invariable rule can be laid down, as so much depends upon the longitudinal gradient of the road. In undulating country a flatter camber can be adopted than in the Fen district. Mr. Dryland urges that a greater width than 100 feet should be assigned to arterial roads. I hesitate to dogmatise, but Mr. Dryland will remember that his lot is cast in a goodly county where milk and honey flow more freely than elsewhere. There are other regions where feet and inches have to be very anxiously studied.

Mr. W. P. Robinson raises the question of the maximum width for carriage-ways. I am inclined to agree that, in the absence of tramways, any width exceeding 40 feet requires special justification.

Mr. C. Cattlin's question as to the bearing power of various subsoils is extremely interesting, and it must be admitted that our colleagues in the United States have probably studied the subject more deeply than we have.

With regard to bituminous surfacing, it may be doubted whether the time is ripe for the production of standard specifications. Methods are undergoing modification from day to day in the light of experience and research. A stereotyped formula might only check the advance.

I am greatly indebted to the speakers for the very kindly tone of the discussion and their generous references to the department over which Sir Henry Maybury presides.

Written communications have also been received from the following:—

From Mr. James W. Tyler (Fellow)—

Colonel Bressey's interesting Paper, read at The Institution on the 7th December, and the excellent lantern slides which illustrated it, dealt exclusively with main trunk roads.

There was insufficient time for the discussion to be extended to that branch of the subject with which perhaps the majority of the members are in contact, namely, the construction of secondary roads involved in the development of building land.

It would be interesting to know whether a rather refreshing experience I have recently had in road-making for development purposes is typical of a much less rigid attitude of local authorities in general on this question and their policy as to the "taking over" of roads than one has hitherto been accustomed to. On submitting plans for new roads for the development of a building estate on the outskirts of a Yorkshire seaside town, I have been able to make the following arrangement with the local corporation: Conditionally on the carriage-ways conforming to an agreed specification, they, as distinct from the footways, are to be taken over immediately they are completed and fit for traffic without waiting for the completion of the buildings (or the larger number of them), as has hitherto been the general practice in my experience. They will thenceforward be repairable by the corporation. The specification for the carriage-ways, which are 20 feet in width, provides for a foundation of 6-inch hard-core and metalling of 5 inches (subsequently increased to 6 inches) cement concrete reinforced with No. 9 British Reinforcement Company's material, finished with tar-spraying dusted over. There are the usual sewers with man-holes, lamp-holes, and road gulleys, also connections for house drains at suitable intervals, the average depth of sewers being about 8 feet 6 inches. Threading conduits of 4-inch stoneware pipes are also laid transversely under the carriage-ways at junctions for connection of water, gas and electric light mains, &c., from one side to the other without opening up. Kerbs 10 inches by 7 inches of concrete on concrete bed are provided; but the footways are being formed only, and not metalled as yet; and this will not be done until the water, gas and electric light mains, which will be laid under the footways, are in and the buildings erected and connections made. The footways are 10 feet wide, and there are no verges. The subsoil is gravel, and it is therefore practicable to dispense with metalling for the footways for a short time to permit of this arrangement. Under other conditions, of course, some metalling of a temporary character would probably be necessary for foot traffic pending final paving. The cost of two of these roads and sewers which are now completed has amounted to £1 11*s.* 2*d.* per foot run, the contract being the result of tendering, and this, of course, is a very low figure in the light of present-day costs. Without gravel on the spot, both for concrete and for the natural bed, it would be out of the question. There was practically no cutting or embankment necessary.

The electric-light mains are laid in by the corporation free of charge; also the water mains; but the owners pay 20 per cent. of the cost of the latter, recovering the same from purchasers under their contracts by charging them 1*s.* per foot frontage in addition to the price of the land. Gas mains are laid in by the supply company on payment by the owners of an initial contribution of 1*s.* 3*d.* per foot run of main, the same being likewise refunded to the owners by the frontage purchasers. These mains are laid under the footways on both sides of the roads. The fact that there will be no "paving expenses" falling upon the purchasers in respect of the carriage-ways is, of course, taken into account in fixing the price of the frontage lands.

Colonel Bressey stressed the advantage of providing accommodation for public mains under roads with facilities for access. Another speaker thought this was only justifiable in the case of densely populated areas on the grounds of expense. I remember that in the first Paper I ever heard read at The Surveyors' Institution some thirty-nine years ago by our esteemed member Mr. William Woodward, entitled "London "Re-modelled" (to which Paper, by the way, reference was made by our present President in his Opening Address), this idea was foreshadowed and illustrated; but he would find the task of providing for the medley of pipes, &c., shown in one of Colonel Bressey's lantern slides, a formidable one.

One speaker expressed the view that he felt safer travelling on the modern roads "behind a horse" than by motor. I do not think this is the general experience. The general opinion, I feel sure, is that the present method of surfacing our main roads is exceedingly dangerous to horse traffic.

From Mr. Edward Willis (Fellow)—

I have had great pleasure in reading Colonel Bressey's Paper on "Modern Methods of Road-making," and should have much liked to attend and take part in the discussion. As it is, I would like to say a few words thereon, since I have had the privilege of examining on this subject on more than one occasion, and I feel a Paper of this kind is particularly helpful to students of The Institution as well as to its older members, who should endeavour to follow every word, so that they can apply the information given to cases which may come within their own experience.

As the only engineering representative on the late Local Government Board Inspecting Committee for the arterial roads in the North-West and South-West of London, I had an excellent opportunity in 1913-14 of realising not only the importance of the new arterial roads in and around London but of appreciating the difficulties that had to be overcome, and it is a matter of regret to me that one road, viz., the extension of the Great West Road, Brentford By-pass, from Chiswick to Cromwell Road, did not obtain the final approval of the whole conference; and I cannot help feeling the longer this important exit from and entrance to London from the West is deferred, the greater will be the cost. In fact, even in my own district, the cost is already increasing by reason of building development, which I am unable to stop, and at the present moment cannot get sufficiently modified without heavy compensation, which I have no authority to incur on behalf of either the County Council or the Government.

It is a moot point whether the principle of the wide carriage-way or the two carriage-ways is the better; but, as far as I can see from experience, it would appear the wide carriage-way is the better where there is ample police supervision in towns, and the duplicate roadways for separate up and down traffic as the arterial road gets farther from the heart of the metropolis or the city to which it leads.

One of the greatest improvements in the modern arterial roads in undoubtedly the reservation of the footpaths only for all mains, cables, ducts, and services. Not only will this avoid the interference with traffic, but will mean much greater economy in the future by the permanent preservation of the foundation, which is so often damaged by trenches in existing roads.

Turning to page 44, the principles of carriage-way construction laid down by Colonel Bressey will bear absolutely the closest investigation, and should become practically the text-book to the student of The Institution prior to his final examination. Although I am a user of the hard-core referred to by the author, it is not because of its cost, but mainly because of the ease with which it can be obtained in the neighbourhood of London, and for branch roads I think a good hard-core foundation, properly consolidated with an impervious surface above will result in the formation of a road sufficient for all normal conditions of local traffic. Where, however, through traffic or main road heavy traffic is likely to be met with, then it seems to me a permanent foundation of concrete should be invariably provided, and either finished with a granite and bitumen surface, asphalt surface, or wood-block paving, the latter, in my opinion, still being preferable in most cases to asphalt by reason of its greater resiliency and noiselessness.

The Great West Road, which passes through Chiswick still, I believe, receives the bulk of the western traffic out of London, and I decided not to advise the extra cost of reinforcement on the last occasion that I reconstructed this road; in this I was supported by the county engineer. I have adopted reinforcement of two or three kinds where necessary, but I am of opinion that a single layer of reinforcement does not give a material length of life, but any of the double layers of reinforcement, if carefully laid, should be of benefit.

I have constructed only one 60-ft. concrete road with a substantial granite concrete surfacing, but in this instance I did two-coat work in diagonal bays with a double heavy "Expamet" reinforcement, and up to the present, in spite of very heavy lorry traffic, this is giving perfect satisfaction.

In conclusion I would like to express my personal thanks to Colonel Bressey for his admirable contribution to our Transactions, feeling how instructive it will prove to all those who are daily engaged upon road construction work.

Paper 496.

RECENT FORESTRY DEVELOPMENT.

By William Ling Taylor (Fellow).

To be read at the Third Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution, 11th January, 1926.

Since the publication of the Report of the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion and Afforestation in 1909, forestry in the British Islands can be said to have suffered some serious set-backs, and at the same time to have made important and far-reaching advances. The evidence before this Royal Commission disclosed a state of affairs by no means creditable to the mother country of a great Empire, and plainly indicated the necessity of abandoning the laisser faire policy in afforestation of the latter half of the nineteenth century. It was very clearly shown that the burden was being carried by the owners of the great landed estates, to whom, as it has since been realised, the thanks of the nation are due for the provision of those stands of pitwood and round timber which subsequently became invaluable. The fact that interest in forestry arose more often from æsthetic or sporting considerations than from the practical standpoint is not material. Estate forestry was actually the means of freeing much invaluable "tonnage" for the transport of essential foodstuffs and munitions at a period of gravest stress.

State forestry prior to the war was an ill-nourished bantling, for whose welfare no one seemed at all anxious to take responsibility. The Report of 1909, however, compelled some notice, and spurred the Government of the day to take action by placing forestry under the wing of the Development Commission, by whom steps were taken to appoint advisory officers, further to stimulate landowners to interest themselves in their woodlands. With the assistance also of this department, emergency seed beds were sown towards the close of the war in the Crown nurseries, and these afterwards proved a most valuable asset.

There were no properly managed State forests from which inspiration could be drawn, and the position was that from an estimated three million acres of woods in the United Kingdom, all but 3 per cent. of which were in private ownership, very little merchantable timber was produced, the yield from these woods, which, after all, represented only about 4 per cent. of the total area of the British Islands, not being estimated at more than 15 cubic feet per acre per annum, or, roughly, a quarter of what it should have been under systematic management.

A world-shattering cataclysm was required to bring home the lesson of neglect, and it was only in the lurid light of the war years that the parlous position which national apathy had permitted to arise was truly realised. The inroads upon our woodlands to provide for the necessities of the war were a devastating set-back to estate forestry. Almost all the mature stands of coniferous timber, and many which were immature but of pitwood size, were felled, and by 1918 very little softwood timber remained in most parts of the country. Large quantities of hardwoods had also gone, including the best of our ash, and there can be no doubt that we were on the verge of very uncomfortable times. It was about a year prior to this juncture that the Forestry Sub-Committee of the Reconstruction Committee was set up, under the chairmanship of Mr. F. D. Acland, "To consider and report upon the best "means of conserving and developing the woodland and "forestry resources of the United Kingdom, having regard "to the experience gained during the war." Their Report was issued in 1916, and laid down the broad principles on which a national forest policy should be based, the immediate objectives, and the means of attaining them.

About the same period events were shaping themselves for what is probably the most severe set-back which can have been inflicted upon a system of afforestation by private enterprise. I refer to the "break-up" movement which has resulted from the disposal of so many landed estates during the past seven years, a movement which is still continuing though perhaps with abated intensity. The first result of the cutting up of so much land has been the destruction of a woefully large aggregate area of our remaining woods. Small owners and speculators, finding woodlands to be something in the nature of an embarrassment, have been quick to re-sell such areas to anyone who would take them off their hands, with the result that stands of timber of all ages have been cut ruthlessly and converted into currency with as little delay as possible. Replanting throughout the country has been the exception rather than the rule in consequence of the all-round rise in costs, and in not a few instances in which replanting has been done the effort has proved abortive owing to the depredations of ground game and the pine weevil.

In the absence of definite action the tide of affairs in British forestry was ebbing, and never was a report more opportune than that of the Acland Committee. This Report was accepted by the Cabinet, and an Interim Forest Authority was appointed in 1918 charged with the duty of making preliminary arrangements for the development of afforestation in the British Islands. In July, 1919, a Bill was introduced into Parliament, passed through both Houses, and given Royal Assent on the 19th August, 1919. On the 29th November of that year the Forestry Commissioners were appointed and at once took up their duties.

The national forest policy defined by the Acland Committee falls under two heads:—

Firstly: A 10-year scheme based on a block grant;

Secondly: The creation in the United Kingdom of reserves of standing timber sufficient to meet essential requirements over a limited period of three years in time of national emergency.

The ten-year scheme is provided for by the Forestry Act, 1919, and is to be regarded as an instalment of the larger plan. It includes the afforestation of 150,000 acres of new land by direct action of the State, the purchase and reconstruction of hardwood areas, and the encouragement of local authorities and private owners to afforest or re-afforest a total of 110,000 acres. The education of forest officers, landowners, and agents, research, experiment, and the fostering of forest industries, are also part of the scheme for the whole of which, for the ten years, a fund of £3,500,000 has been voted. This fund has to bear all the incidental charges of the Forestry Commission, including establishment.

The larger objective recommended by the Acland Committee as a result of their exhaustive enquiry aims at the ultimate afforestation of no less than 1,770,000 acres of land not previously planted, of which 1,180,000 acres should be planted in the first forty years; and, at the same time, the taking of steps to secure the continuance under timber, and to obtain an increased yield from, the 3,000,000 acres of woodland which existed in 1914.

The Forestry Commission have now completed their sixth forest year. At the time of their appointment no forest service existed, nor were there any State forests except the Crown woods, and even in these little progress had been made in establishing systematic management when, by the intervention of the war and the excessive fellings, working plans were reduced to "scraps of paper." The department have, therefore, had to begin at the beginning, having been obliged not only to create their organisation, but actually to acquire the land on which to commence operations. In course of the first forest year, which ended the 30th September, 1920, 33,628 acres of plantable land were secured by purchase or on long lease, and the total area of land acquired up to the present time extends to 243,281 acres, of which 165,414 acres are classified as plantable, and the remainder as "other," i.e., as either too good or too poor to be utilised for timber production. Details concerning the cost to the State of all this land will be of interest, and it may be said that the average rent or feu-duty for land taken by lease or feu is approximately 1*s.* 4*d.* per acre per annum, and the average price of the freehold land purchased is approximately £2 3*s.* 5*d.* per acre; or, if the whole of the cost be charged against plant-able land only, the figures are under 2*s.* 3*d.* and £3 10*s.* per acre respectively. Certain valuable gifts of land have been made to the department, notably one of a Scottish estate extending to about 10,000 acres and containing some 2,500 acres of land which can be planted. On the whole, suitable land has been obtainable much more freely in England and Wales than in Scotland. Including the former Crown woods, which were not transferred to the Forestry Commission until the Order in Council of 21st March, 1924, there are already 96 separate forest areas in Great Britain, 62 of which are in England and Wales, and 34 in Scotland, which can be regarded as nuclei for the building up of the new forests now in the making. Some of these, indeed, have passed the nucleus stage, for Thetford Chase, on the borders of Norfolk and Suffolk, extends to over 25,000 acres in one continuous stretch of plantable land, and large areas are being got together at Allerston in Yorkshire, in North Wales, and in the Lake District. It will be seen, therefore, that the Thetford area already in size rivals William the Norman's New Forest in Hampshire, hitherto generally regarded as the largest of our woodland possessions. Work in the ancient forest areas of Sherwood, Rockingham, Peak, Wyre and Exmoor is proceeding, and wherever land can be made available in such parts, the old forest names with all their wealth of historic and legendary interest will, it is hoped, revive again with the growth of the new plantings and re-establish themselves more strongly than ever in the minds of our countrymen.

The acquisition of land on long lease is proving advantageous both to the landowners and to the State. Under an arrangement of this sort the owner retains the sporting rights and amenity value of his land, over and above which he receives an annual rent and, what is often quite as important, is relieved of much of his burden of rates and taves as well as the whole of the cost of maintenance, while the department are able to obtain possession of the requisite land for their planting operations and to avoid the heavy capital outlay involved by the purchase outright of large areas of freehold land. It is the policy to restrict acquisition to areas of little value for any other purpose, but in parts of England and Wales where no waste land exists, it has been necessary to fall back on mountain grazings. In these cases the high prices ruling for sheep have proved an obstacle, and sheep farmers in a few districts have resented the planting of upland grazings. It is, however, realised in these localities that changes likely to effect a permanent increase both in employment and production cannot be otherwise than a benefit to the district. Arable land is not acquired unless wanted in connection with forest holdings or nurseries or in cases in which such land is of very low value and cannot conveniently be severed from the planting land. In acquiring land the general practice of the Forestry Commission has been to arrange a fair price on the basis of the actual net revenue accruing to the estate.

The first step to be taken with newly acquired land is to enclose a suitably sized block and to exterminate the rabbits within the enclosure. On many of the new areas stock-resisting fencing is fortunately unnecessary, and in all such cases a light rabbit-proof fence of the type adopted experimentally at Rendlesham during the first year is now adopted as the standard pattern. This fence consists of roughly sawn or cleft stakes 10 feet apart with straining posts and struts as required. A single strand of barbed wire is strained taut at a height of 3 feet, and 18-gauge wire netting 42 inches wide with a $1\frac{1}{4}$-inch mesh is then hung from the barbs of the barbed wire and attached to the posts with staples, the barbs in question being bent back over the selvedge of the netting so that no tying on is necessary at all. This arrangement allows of 6 inches of the wire netting being turned up at right angles to the fence and laid upon the surface of the ground outside the enclosure, the "turn-up" being anchored by means of sods laid on at every 3 feet or so. This rabbit fencing has proved absolutely efficient, and can be erected at an all-in average cost of one shilling per yard. Stakes and straining posts have been cut from such rough material as can be found close at hand, and erection at piece-work rates has been carried out as low as one penny per yard. The stakes are pointed and driven into the ground wherever possible, but straining posts must be properly set and strutted. As a protection against rot, the pointed ends of the stakes and posts are charred on the spot. The laying of the "turn-up" on the surface of the ground has proved a most successful deterrent to the rabbit, and is a much more efficient method than the actual burying of the lower 6 inches of the netting in the ground. Rabbits from outside rarely commence to burrow except directly in the angle formed by the fence and the surface of the ground, and so discover the obstruction at once and are disheartened. Where the lower end of the netting is buried, the trouble is that rabbits can easily work downwards to find when they have got down 6 inches or so that the rest of the way is clear. Boundaries are patrolled at least weekly, and any signs of enterprise on the part of rabbits from adjacent unenclosed lands are at once countered. Gates, as often as possible of the inexpensive "lift" type, need careful netting and attention. In sheep districts, sheep netting or strong post and wire must be used, but fortunately it is not unusual to find in such localities that the rabbit is absent or nearly so, thanks probably to the shepherd's dog, so that the dual purpose and still more expensive type of fence is seldom a necessity. In hunting districts, hunting gates are erected wherever they are reasonably necessary, but, notwithstanding this, there have been several cases of quite inexcusable wire cutting.

The best way of preparing ground for planting is to burn off the surface vegetation as closely as possible and to lay bare the mineral soil by "screefing." The cheapest method so far devised is to plough shallow furrows the desired distance apart, when the planting can be done by means of the "L" notch in the bottom of the furrow using the ordinary straight digging spade. On bare land in East Anglia and elsewhere it has been found possible to use the plough, an implement specially designed to plough two furrows the correct distance apart, and drawn by a tractor or horses at a cost of 6*s.* per acre. The notching has been done by piece-work rates at from 10*d.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per 100 plants according to the size of the plants used and the nature of the ground. The usual spacing is at 4 feet 6 inches each way except for Douglas fir, Sitka spruce, and sometimes other species, which may suitably be planted further apart. The object of the screefing or ploughing is twofold. Firstly, it is essential to break up the thin and often hard surface layer of peat, raw humus, or lichen, to ensure aeration, and, secondly, it is necessary to remove the natural flora to avoid, as far as possible, the severe root competition for what is often a limited supply of soil moisture to which the young transplants would otherwise be subjected. On hill ground the procedure is similar except that the plough can seldom be used. Instead, the screefing is done in patches with the required spacing, and the plant is notched or planted with the mattock in the bared patch. Burning does not always effectively clear the surface vegetation on this type of ground, but, generally speaking, the more thorough the burning off the better. The Schlich spade has been employed on the harder gravelly soils, especially on some of the closely cemented gravels of the Bagshot series in Berkshire and Hampshire. Experience, so far, indicates that subsoiling is to be avoided, especially on light lands where disturbance of the subsoil prior to planting has been found a decided disadvantage. Where "pan" occurs, however, subsoiling has sometimes been done as part of the preparation for planting, notably on the oolitic soils of the East Yorkshire moors. Iron pan occurs more generally in the Dorset heath region than in any other district in which planting work is now proceeding. Here, however, the pan is hardly ever continuous, and varies much in depth below the surface.

The selection of species for planting is naturally governed principally by local circumstances of soil and climate. Certain geological formations favour particular species in a marked way, as may be seen from the excellent average growth of Corsican pine on soils of the new red sandstone, while the behaviour of Douglas fir and other conifers on greensand is well known. The degree of shelter afforded by the lie of the land is one more of the several factors. In every case, before deciding what to plant on a given area, the relative data must closely be examined. The species so far used have been chiefly Scots and Corsican pines, Norway and Sitka spruces, European and Japanese larches, and Douglas fir with other conifers in small numbers only. For the stocking of the small area of hardwoods, oak, Spanish chestnut, beech, and poplar, have been the principal trees used. A few bat willows are making a good showing at Rendlesham.

The plantations of conifers are principally pure, but in some districts as much of the beating up as possible, up to a maximum of 15 per cent., is being carried out with beech as a soil improver.

A great deal of work has been done with the 1 plus 1 and 2 plus 1 Scots and Corsican pines, and these sizes of transplants have been found very suitable on the lighter lands and hillsides. Where weeds are rank, 2 plus 2 transplants are at times advisable, and in the case of Norway spruce still older plants can sometimes be utilised with advantage. On the East Anglian sands and in other parts two-year pine seedlings have given satisfactory results, but they must be of the sturdy open-grown type. They are, of course, very cheap plants to use. Generally speaking, recent experience is more and more in favour of the smaller plants except for the spruces. Beating up is done in the second year after planting, an arrangement making for economy with some species, for Douglas fir, larch, and spruce, as well as some of the hardwoods, although apparently dead at the end of the first season, will often come away again from below during the following spring. With pines, however, this hope is usually a forlorn one, and plantings of these can safely be filled up in course of the season immediately following the formation of the plantations.

The areas planted during the six years include 52,279 acres of conifers and 2,254 acres of hardwoods, a total of 54,533 acres. The proportion of hardwoods planted is less than is desirable, but the postponement of this more expensive work has been made in deference to the necessity for economy. In addition to the acreage planted by the Forestry Commission, grants made by them to public bodies and private individuals have resulted in the planting, or preparation with definite undertaking to plant, of 49,695 acres. The total area of new plantings in Great Britain carried out under the auspices of the department during the past six years is therefore 104,228 acres.

One of the important recommendations of the Acland Committee was that the work of afforestation should be divided in this way between the State and public bodies, and private owners assisted by State grants, and the planting or replanting of no less than 110,000 acres was contemplated through the medium of free grants in the course of the first ten-year period. The scheme of regular grants envisaged by the Acland Committee has, however, been superseded temporarily by unemployment grants, in view of the lamentable existing conditions regarding unemployment. These unemployment grants have been sanctioned season by season for the past four planting seasons up to the amount of £3 per acre for every acre planted, or up to a like amount for preparation for planting, including the necessary nursery operations. With either of these two grants a further sum up to £2 per acre has been allowed for every acre of standing scrub cleared as part of the preparation for subsequent planting. The maximum grant available has therefore been £3 per acre unless the area is a scrub-covered one, when a total up to £5 per acre has been paid. The proper definition of "scrub" has been strictly adhered to in these cases, and acceptance of the grant for preparation for planting has implied an undertaking to plant within two years. Simple regulations only have been imposed, providing for inspection and for an amount of not less than the total grant to be expended on wages to bona fide unemployed, stipulating also for 75 per cent. of the unemployed labour engaged to be ex-Service men, if available, and for any relative contracts to be placed in Great Britain.

The normal grants are now obtainable, subject to equally simple regulations, and up to £2 per acre for the planting and maintenance of conifers, and £4 per acre for hardwoods can be obtained, while a further grant up to £1 per acre, and in exceptional cases up to £2 per acre, is allowed to assist the conversion of worthless scrub areas into productive forest. All these rates are to be regarded as maxima, and 75 per cent. of the grant earned is payable on the satisfactory completion of the work. The remaining 25 per cent. of the money will be paid four years later provided any necessary beating up has been done and the plantation properly maintained. It should be noted that no scheme is eligible for a grant unless previously approved in writing by the Forestry Commissioners. To public bodies the maximum grant for planting is £4 10*s.* per acre, and for scrub-clearing £2 per acre, or in special cases, one-third of the actual net cost with a limit of £4 per acre. A total of £8 10*s.* is therefore the maximum grant which can be paid to public bodies.

The average cost of the planting done on the Forestry Commission's areas is £7 10*s.* per acre, and where it has been possible to use the plough, as already described, on some of the lighter lands, planting has been effectively carried out at as low a cost as £4 10*s.* per acre. The expenses of preparing the ground, drainage, fencing, plants, beating up and weeding, are included in these figures, but not the cost of supervision. Except for seed, tools, and wire, the whole of the expenditure has been on wages. Of the total area dealt with, however, part only can be deemed to have been "afforested," if the term is used strictly to denote the planting up of land not previously utilised for timber production.

The desirability of piece-work in forestry operations is often questioned, but the system has been largely adopted by the Forestry Commission, and, given proper supervision, it works well, and is of advantage both to the employer and to the employed. The essence of successful piece-work in forestry lies in capable supervision.

Notable afforestation work is being done on the catchment areas in connection with the public water schemes, especially at Thirlmere, Derwent Valley, Vyrnwy, and Rhayader in England and Wales, and at Camps and Talla in Scotland, where some extensive forests are being built up, thanks to the public-spirited enterprise of the great cities concerned. At Lake Vyrnwy some of the Liverpool Corporation's earliest plantations of larch, spruce and Douglas fir have already attained convertible size, and a visit to this most beautiful spot would be of no disadvantage to any who remain sceptical regarding the possibilities of home-timber production.

Pioneering in the field has, of course, been beset with difficulties. Troubles and pests have been numerous. The prolonged drought of 1921 tried out the department's early efforts very severely, and drought has been a feature of each spring and summer in many localities in which the work has been proceeding. In these circumstances the best safeguard has been found to lie in the careful firming in of the plants and the avoidance of undue disturbance of the subsoil prior to planting. Frost, especially the dangerous spring and summer visitations, has been responsible for damage, particularly to young Douglas fir. During winter, however, frosts have not been very troublesome except in nursery seed-beds which have been subject to "lift," and measures of protection have been necessary. Snow-fall of recent years has been almost negligible, though there has been some loss of time in the north from this cause. The torrential rains which occur from time to time have resulted in wash-outs, disastrous in the nurseries even in the level districts of East Anglia, and sunburn has also been responsible for losses. The rabbit can be dealt with, and rabbit damage is proving rare. Hares, which are more difficult to exclude, have been kept within bounds, but deer are a potential source of danger to plantations in their earlier stages. In Scotland and certain districts in England the red deer can do much damage, and fallow deer, of which many have escaped from parks in recent years, are also troublesome in the districts in which they are establishing themselves. The roe, our smallest native deer, is still surprisingly evenly spread over the woodlands of central and southern England, and is also met with in the north. He can be a remarkably destructive little customer. Japanese and other imported deer have been turned down at various centres, and it may be taken that wherever there are very extensive areas of old woodland, some deer will be present. Moles, mice and voles have all been numerous, especially the first mentioned, in the nurseries, two-year seedling plantations and in the direct sowings, large numbers of seedlings and small plants having been destroyed by the loose earth thrown up so freely by those creatures. Squirrels and black game are also depredators in their respective ways. Of insect pests the pine weevil and beetles have been sources of anxiety, but have been effectively controlled by trapping. These pests have been incredibly numerous in the neighbourhood of war-felled coniferous plantations, which have provided ideal breeding grounds. Weevil and beetle can be dealt with, but vigilance is necessary, for neither is in any way to be belittled as a forest foe. Pine shoot tortrix is a minor trouble in comparison though very widely spread, and the cause of a good deal of temporary damage in the Scots pine plantations. Chermes have been prevalent, but it is comforting to be assured that Chermes Cooleyi, which has infected the older Douglas fir in some districts, has not yet proved its ability to complete its life cycle in Great Britain. Among the other insects to attain notoriety recently have been the green spruce aphis, which has been the cause of much defoliation and some mortality amongst the spruces, and the oak-leaf roller, whose activities have been apparent to all south-country dwellers. This last pest has preyed especially severely upon the oak woods of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, and the results of successive years of almost complete defoliation are plainly to be seen. Fortunately, last spring, the visitation showed signs of abating. One remedy seems to lie in the partial substitution of the sessile flowered oak, which flushes its leaves earlier in the season, for the pedunculate oak. This earlier habit, and the fact that its young leaves speedily become tougher than those of the common oak, appear to account for the comparative immunity of the sessile oaks which has been observed by a number of foresters. Both these oaks are native species, and either can attain large size. Fungous disease has, up to now, been most damaging in the nursery seed-beds, where some damping off of seedlings and root fungus troubles have occurred. Honey fungus and others are ever with us, however, and it is too much to expect that the future will be free from inconveniences from these causes. It is unfortunate that susceptibility to disease now prohibits the economic planting of Weymouth pine and common silver fir in this country, two timber trees which otherwise would be of the greatest service to British forestry.

Possibly the most urgent danger to all these new forests is that from fire, and the organisation of adequate measures of fire protection has been the subject of very serious consideration from the outset. Fire lines are, of course, laid down between compartments and along boundaries varying in width up to 100 feet. Hardwood species, non-inflammable in comparision with conifers, are being planted along the sides of the fire lines and rides, and it is hoped to make use in the same way of black Italian and other poplars in suitable localities to assist in the isolation of future Crown fires by the interception of flying sparks. In the larger forests the best guarantee of safety lies in effective fire control with observation posts at suitable points. As 126 separate fires, resulting in the loss of 641 acres, occurred in 1924, it will be seen that this danger is a very real one, and one, moreover, which a careful public can help enormously to abate.

Smoke and fumes constitute an important factor when species are to be chosen for planting within a measurable radius of any industrial centre. The area affected is often wide, and examination of young plantations in such localities shows that among the most tolerant of the coniferæ are Sitka spruce, Japanese larch, and Corsican pine. European larch and Scots pine are both unsatisfactory, and common spruce only a little less so, European larch often dying at an early age, and Scots pine growing slowly and failing to develop. The fact that mature specimens of any given tre can be found in a neighbourhood of this sort is no criterion of the value of the species for present-day planting. Industrialism has grown by leaps and bounds, and it will generally be found that these specimen trees have stood long enough to have attained their height growth before the advent of the chimney-stack and the coke oven. There are a number of instances of this sort of thing to be seen in the southern Pennine region and not a few in South Wales, and there can be little doubt that false premises have been drawn from the presence of well-grown mature trees, both conifers and hardwoods, in such localities. Sheep offer a fairly reliable guide, for within the smoke radius the unwashed fleece invariably reflects the presence of a soot-laden atmosphere.

Foresters the world over are ever attempting to devise means to lessen the cost of establishing plantations, and this desire has led to experiments in the direct sowing of forest-tree seeds in many countries. Continental and American experience has not been very encouraging, and in Germany success has been found to depend largely on the degree of regular soil moisture available. The sowing of acorns direct into the forest is by no means new in this country, and from time to time conifer seed has also been sown direct. Experiments in this direction have been made each season since 1920, and Scots, Corsican and Maritime pine, and Pinus insignis, also Norway and Sitka spruce and Douglas fir seeds, have been sown in various parts of the country under widely different circumstances of soil and climate. The method has been to lay bare the mineral soil in evenly spaced patches and to sow a few seeds in each patch. Experience points to April as the most favourable month for the sowing, and complete success has been achieved on light soils in East Anglia and in the south of England with Maritime pine, at a very low cost of £1 per acre, including the cost of the seed. Results with the other pines are good enough to warrant perseverance. The spruces and Douglas fir have been tried only on a smaller scale, but have given some satisfactory early results which are being watched with care. Failures have, of course, occurred owing to incorrect soil repparation and treatment, drought, sunburn, and fungoid troubles. Progress in this direction will not be aided by haphazard methods of trial and error, but rather through the close scrutiny of the circumstances governing the successful cases for careful comparison with the conditions under which the failures have occurred, for it is only in this way that errors of technique can be detected with any degree of certainty.

Direct sowings of acorns have not given results equal to those obtained on the Continent. Mice, voles and birds are to a great extent responsible, and for the excessive numbers of these nuisances no doubt the persistent killing down of owls, hawks, and other "small deer" which pass as vermin, is largely responsible. The average cost of seed and labour in these direct sowings has been under 35*s.* per acre, a figure which compares very well indeed with the minimum cost of planting.

The necessary plants for each year's planting programme are raised in the department's nurseries, which are suitably located in various parts of the country, and now extend to over 500 acres stocked with some 200 million seedlings and 60 million transplants. Lining out is done at piece-work rates varying from 10*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* per thousand according to the type of plant and the nature of the nursery soil. The most favoured method is by means of a straight-sided trench, and the pernicious "nicking-in" system is not encouraged. Transplanting boards are in use in some of the nurseries, but this method of lining out is not universally employed.

Very large quantities of seed are sown annually, and the sources from which forest seeds are being drawn are world wide. Seed is sown broadcast or in drills in the seed-beds, and the prevailing tendency to sow too thickly has always to be combatted. Quantities, of course, vary with sizes of the seeds, and for conifers 1 lb. of seed is sufficient for from 120 to 250 square feet of seed-bed area according to species. Great care has to be taken that seeds are not sown too deeply, and especially in the case with the smaller seeds such as Sitka spruce. With most conifers it is advisable to soak the seed prior to sowing, and a dressing of red lead is of advantage as a deterrent to vermin. Limited quantities of the seeds of certain conifers can be collected in this country, and especially is this true of Scots pine. Supplies of Scots pine cones are collected annually by the department, and the seed is extracted at Alice Holt, in Hampshire, where a kiln has been hired each season. The cones are opened by heating in the kiln up to 112 degrees Fahrenheit, the seed shaken out, rubbed clean and winnowed, as much as 2,990 pounds having been extracted in one year at a cost of 8*s.* 6*d.* per pound. The average yield per bushel of cones is 10 ozs. of seed. This home-produced seed gives a very high germination, produces strong seedlings, and compares satisfactorily in quality and price with imported seed. Except that mast years occur only intermittently, the seeds of the common hardwood trees are best if collected at home.

The scheme for the establishment of forest workers' holdings, which was inaugurated in the latter half of 1924, is a departure likely to prove far-reaching in its effects upon the well-being and prosperity of the forest populations of the future. It is believed that this scheme can be of considerable aid to land settlement at relatively low cost, and the advantages to be derived from the settlement of permanent forest workers in part-time holdings are weighty. The scheme, as at present laid down, entails the creation of small holdings, not more than five in number for each thousand acres of forest land acquired, the occupiers of which will have the guarantee of not less than 150 days' work in the forest, for the most part at piece-work rates at which the workers can earn more than the local agricultural wage. An important point about these holdings is that they are not intended to provide full-time occupation for the tenants, and in this respect they constitute a type entirely distinct from the statutory small holdings. Out of the remaining working days of the year, the occupier of a forest worker's holding will have ample time for the proper cultivation and care of his holding, which will include a cottage, buildings, garden, and up to 10 acres of enclosed cultivable land with additional grazing wherever available. It will thus be possible for him to keep two cows and to produce any crops suited to the character of his land, and it is considered that poultry, especially geese, may be a valuable adjunct. The maximum expenditure authorised on the house and buildings is limited to £800, and the maximum value of the enclosed land which may be let with a holding is £150. Every endeavour will be made to render the broad outline of the scheme adaptable to local necessities and conditions. The holdings will, as far as practicable, be fitted in with the general lay-out of plantations in groups of three or more, with the twofold object of arranging suitable communities and of spreading the available labour as evenly as possible over the forest area, to avoid losses of time in getting to the daily task and to secure the maximum degree of protective overlooking which an evenly spread personnel alone can afford. It is not unsual to find a forest visualised as a dense and unbroken series of woods or plantations; but this is not altogether right, for it is more generally found in countries possessing far broader acres than our own that, with the passing of the primeval forests, timbered lands are made to alternate with those areas possessing a higher agricultural value, which higher value is usually exploited to the full, at any rate, in the timber-producing countries of the old world. In this way not only is the land actually employed to the best advantage, but the intervening farms and holdings benefit from the shelter afforded by the woods and from their very considerable influence on the conservation and regulation of the supply of soil moisture in their neighbourhood.

With the estates acquired for afforestation a considerable number of cottages are being taken over, the price of which has in all cases been included in that of the land; and of these cottages over 100 are already available, at very little expense, for the purpose of the scheme. This, of course, appreciably reduces the average cost of the first holdings to be established, though the full authorised expenditure will be reached in certain of the forests where no houses have previously existed and the cost of building is necessarily high. Other types of existing buildings are also being utilised wherever possible. In one instance an old estate laundry has been transformed into an attractive small-holder's house, and in a number of other cases farm and estate buildings have been converted into comfortable bungalow cottages. The cost of this work is being kept extraordinarily low by the adoption of a policy of direct labour and the purchase of materials in bulk. With one property an entire hamlet was purchased, the cottages and premises being in a most deplorable condition when taken over. The changes effected at low cost are an eloquent testimony of what can be done, and the department has already gone far to remodel this small village.

At present the new holdings and those in course of creation are 170 in number, still more are planned, and the settlement in this way for each 1,000 acres of five families who will closely identify themselves with the forest, and look with increasing confidence to the plantations and their holdings for livelihood, cannot fail to produce its permanent effect. Whatever may be said of the attitude of those in other walks of life towards their work at the present time, it is beyond doubt that the forester's interests are centred in his job, and that the call of the woods is an insistent call, and one which will be heard and heeded by others than those of the first generation who will occupy the new forest workers' holdings. Furthermore, the scheme holds out to an industrious man, who will realise the possibilities arising out of the occupation of land in such circumstances, an exceptional opportunity to improve his position, and to raise, for himself and his family, his standard of living.

Training in forestry is proceeding at the apprentices' schools at Parkend in the Forest of Dean, and at Beaufort in Inverness-shire, where selected men satisfactorily completing a two years' course are granted certificates of proficiency. These men are then absorbed without difficulty into the departments organisation, the colonial forest services, or by private estates. Courses of training for forest officers leading to degrees or diplomas in forestry are provided at the principal universities, and in 1924 arrangements were made to give effect to a resolution of the British Empire Forestry Conference, held in Canada the previous year, for founding at Oxford an institution, now known as the Imperial Forestry Institute, for post-graduate courses. The Institute is controlled by a Board of Governors, of whom the University nominates one-half, and the Forestry Commission and the Colonial Office the remainder.

Research and experiment are being pursued systematically, and results are published from time to time in the official bulletins and leaflets and in the department's Journal. British yield tables for conifers were published in 1920, based on the measurement of a large number of selected sample plots in the United Kingdom.

The proper method of dealing with peat-covered land has yet to be discovered, and experiments are being conducted with this end in view. The difficulties arise out of the unfavourable physical and chemical characteristics of the peat, which lacks aeration, possesses an unduly high moisture content and degree of acidity, and is often almost entirely devoid of the mineral constituents which are found in ordinary soils, and which are essential to successful tree growth. There are very large areas of land covered with a depth of 12 inches or more of peat in Great Britain, especially in mountain regions over the older geological formations other than the limestones. At present the planting of trees on peat presents little prospect of success except where the areas can be drained and aerated and the tree roots brought into contact with some mineral soil, and the problem awaiting a practical solution is as important as it is involved.

Little can be said regarding those hardy perennials the rating of woodlands and railway freights, for recent developments in these directions have not been very striking.

The census of woodlands in the United Kingdom, commenced in 1921 at the instance of the Imperial Forestry Conference in 1920, is now approaching completion. The work has been done in Scotland by the Forestry Commission's staff with the aid of local correspondents, and in England and Wales through the agency of the Forestry Commission Consultative Committees and private gentlemen who have volunteered to organise the investigation in their counties. The scheme forms part of the larger plan of ascertaining as closely as possible the forest resources of the Empire, and the result of the census is bound to prove vitally interesting. A census of production is also proceeding in connection with the General Census of Production, 1924, to determine the quantities and values of the yield of timber from British woodlands during the year. Enquiry is being limited to selected representative estates, and the form of schedule in use was adopted in consultation with the Board of Trade, the Consultative Committees, and the Arboricultural Societies.

Forestry has been required to do its quota towards the relief of unemployment during the past five years, and it has not always been remembered in time that the scale on which forestry schemes can be put in hand for this purpose depends not only on the amount of money forthcoming but also on the time available for the essential preparatory work. Without the land on which to operate or the nursery stock necessary for an augmented planting programme, little can really be done; but notwithstanding the difficulties, much relief work, fencing, draining, scrub-clearing, preparing and planting has been organised, and employment up to 45,000 man-weeks per season has been provided for the unemployed under the auspices of the department. It is satisfactory to note that country-bred labourers recruited promiscuously under such schemes, although generally unskilled in forestry operations, have quickly adapted themselves to the work, and have, with remarkably few exceptions, rendered efficient service.

Apart from the relief schemes, the total employment in the new forests so far approximates 2,000 men throughout the summer months and over 3,000 in winter. The influence of forestry on rural unemployment is appreciable, but its growth is dependent upon a steady adherence to a settled policy. The vital need of continuity of policy in forestry was the subject of an earnest appeal to statesmen and Members of Parliament by the Forestry Commission in their Fifth Annual Report, wherein it was shown how damaging instability of purpose can be to an undertaking dependent, perhaps more than any other, on forethought and timely preparation.

An important aspect from the standpoint of rural economy is that the employment created is, to all intents and purposes, entirely new. For instance, an area acquired by the department in England, on which eight men only were employed, has since provided work for a yearly average of 50 men in summer and 105 men in winter, and in Scotland, on hill land, the result has been an immediate increase in labour of between 60 and 70 per cent.

Granted continuity of policy, much can now be hoped for, and that the new forests now being formed will develop into treasured national possessions who can doubt, for every true Briton loves a tree and the appeal of the woods is strong in most of us. As to financial return, very little land now being classed as plantable is capable of producing less than 60 cubic feet of timber per acre per annum on suitable rotation under systematic management, and while the value of this yield on the basis of present prices is readily calculable, none can dispute that its value to succeeding generations may be vastly more.

Surveyors' Institution

Session 1925-1926.

At the Ordinary General Meeting

Held on Monday, 11th January, 1926,

A DISCUSSION took place on a Paper entitled

RECENT FORESTRY DEVELOPMENTS,

By William Ling Taylor (Fellow),
Special Forestry Diploma.

Mr. John D. Wallis (President) in the Chair.

Before the reading of the Paper the Secretary read the following letter which had been received from the Home Office in reply to The Institution's letter of condolence to His Majesty the King on the death of Her late Majesty Queen Alexandra :—

"Home Office,
Whitehall,
23rd December, 1925.

Sir,

I am directed by the Secretary of State to inform you that the loyal and dutiful Address of the President, Council, and Members of The Surveyors' Institution on the occasion of the lamented death of Her late Majesty Queen Alexandra has been laid before the King, who has commanded the Secretary of State to convey to you His Majesty's thanks for this expression of their sympathy.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
A. J. EAGLESTON.

The SECRETARY,
The Surveyors' Institution,
12, Great George Street, S.W. 1."

Mr. JOHN MAUGHAN (Member of Council), in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Taylor, said the Paper was more than a record of the work of the Forestry Commission; it was a very valuable text-book which he hoped every member would study.

With regard to the rent at which the Forestry Commissioners were able to obtain land, namely, 1*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.* per acre, he could not say that where he lived, in the North Riding of Yorkshire amongst the dales, he knew of any land which could be got at that price. He knew the difficulties of the Forestry Commissioners; they were up against the value of grazing rights, to say nothing of sporting rights. He remembered the day when a goose was worth as much as a Scotch lamb, but it would take a good many geese to-day to pay for a Scotch lamb.

With regard to the distance of 4 feet 6 inches apart for planting, he would suggest that where Scotch fir was going to be a permanent crop the distance apart might be reduced to 4 feet, and that in the case of spruce it should be increased to 5 feet.

In the Paper would be found mention of the existence of a pan at Allerston, near Scarborough. He had not dug below the surface of Allerston Moor, but he did know the adjoining moor of Wykeham very well because he had been interested in a rating case there, and underneath Wykeham Moor, at varying depths from a few inches to, say, 18 inches, there was the hardest pan he had ever come across. It was impossible to break it up even with a pickaxe. He did not know how the Forestry Commissioners were going to get rid of it unless they used dynamite.

With regard to the choice of species, he wished he had never seen Japanese larch. In 1912, when the Royal Agricultural Society held a Forestry Competition in Yorkshire, there was at Jervaulx a plantation of Japanese larch which won a first prize, and was described by Dr. Somerville as the finest in the country; but to-day it was an absolute wreck due to phomopsis.

He could not help thinking that one of the most valuable trees which they had was the Sitka spruce. It had the great advantage that it could not be smothered: it would come through bracken or anything else, and grew at a rapid rate. Two years ago he had been staying with the factor at Douglas Castle, who had taken him over to Drumlanrig to see the Sitka spruces there. The following were the particulars: The age of the crop, 26 years; the average height of the tallest tree, 61 feet; the average height of the main crop, 58 feet; the girth of the main crop at 4 feet 3 inches, 30 inches; the volume per acre of the main crop, 5,899 cubic feet, and that of the total crop, 5,986 cubic feet; the percentage of bark on the main crop, 11; the periodic mean annual increment per acre of the main crop since the last measurements had been taken in July, 1920, was 541 cubic feet. They were the most remarkable trees in a forest which he had ever seen.

With regard to conifers being planted pure, it might be a coincidence, but it was a fact that at Jervaulx wherever larch pure had been planted, it was a mass of disease; but where they had been mixed with Scotch pine in a proportion, according to the suitability of the soil for larch, disease was absolutely negligible. He had shown them to practical foresters like Dr. Somerville, Sir John Stirling Maxwell, and Dr. Malcolm Wilson, who agreed that though they could not account for it, the fact remained.

With regard to frost holes, he would like to ask whether, when planting hillsides, it was not better to plant from above downwards rather than from below upwards. By commencing from below upwards they created a frost hole, which was to be avoided.

As to peat, Wilton Fell Plantation on the Jervaulx Abbey estate was planted in the year 1815, and was about a hundred years old when felled. It was on a thin peat resting on millstone grit, and was of Scotch pine with a few larch mixed amongst it. The larch averaged in one plot 20½ feet, and the Scotch only 11 feet, and in another plot the larch averaged 11½ feet and the Scotch only 7 feet. Needless to say, he was not going to plant it again.

He should like more information as to the planting of ash. The toxic effect of grasses on an ash was a well-known fact. He could not help thinking that foresters overdid the question of light and shade. It must be remembered that every tree in a natural forest grew from a seedling, and had to fight for its own existence in the shade. Some of the best ash he had ever seen had been on the north side of a plantation sheltered from the sun.

In referring to the use of barbed wire as a support for the wire netting, Mr. Taylor said that cur-dogs killed rabbits, but for every rabbit killed by a dog he would guarantee that a fox killed a thousand. A fox was a very useful forester indeed, because he assisted in keeping down the moles, the mice, and the rabbits. If one had a fox, then one must have a pack of hounds to give amusement to the fox. If it was not for the hunt, the fox would cease to exist.

With regard to the use of barbed wire, the idea suggested in the Paper was a very ingenious one, but he would defy anybody to turn the barbs down so that they would not do any injury either to hounds or fox.

He had the greatest pleasure in proposing a most hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Taylor for his excellent Paper. To himself it had been, if not the most, at any rate, one of the most interesting Papers he had heard read at The Institution.

Mr. Leslie S. Wood (Fellow, Special Forestry Diploma) said it was his pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Taylor for his illuminating Paper, and, in doing so, he would like to take up the subject where Mr. Taylor had left it. In the last paragraph but one of the Paper Mr. Taylor said: "An important aspect from the stand-" point of rural economy is that the employment created " is, to all intents and purposes, entirely new." Personally he would like to deal with the question of labour, which, to his mind, was a very important factor in the forestry of the future.

To-day there was a shortage of labour for woodland work, due, apparently, to the fact that the Forestry Commission had thought it well to enter into arrangements by which they did not pay wages higher than those in the agricultural world. Landowners were also accepting the same principle, for they did not like to pay wages higher than those that the tenants on their estates were paying. The shortage of labour was also created by the fact that in rural parts to-day there was a large amount of building and structural operations going on which was taking men away from the land, and the services of water and gas, which were attendant on those, were also taking men away. Acute as was the shortage of labour to-day, he believed that in the future, when the time came for thinning the plantatations, there would be a much more severe shortage unless steps were taken at once to deal with the trouble. It seemed to him there were three ways in which the difficulty could be dealt with. In the first place he believed it would be an advantage if that alliance with agriculture were no longer binding. Without in any way wishing to break the contracts which had been already made, he believed it would be an advantage if forestry had an entirely free hand in the matter. It the second place, he believed it would be an advantage if better conditions and facilities were offered to attract men back to the land. In the Paper Mr. Taylor referred to the formation of small holdings. That was a recognition on the part of the Forestry Commission that it was advisable to attach to forestry work men who were competent to deal with it, and who would carry on other work at the same time. Personally he was no great believer in the artificial formation of small holdings, but he did believe it would be a very great advantage if the Forestry Commission paid attention to the question of housing in the rural districts. He believed it would not only prove a great advantage to the work, but that it was a duty owed to the nation that a Government department should house its own workmen; and he believed that if the Forestry Commission, with all the facilities which existed to-day for building cottages without employing a vast amount of capital were to direct their attention to the building of cottages to keep pace with the work which was coming along, and the workmen they were going to employ, they would then be able to attract from the towns—not altogether from the countryside—those men who were country bred, and who would be pleased to come back again into the country if they knew there was good housing and work for them under a go-ahead Government department.

He believed, too, that every facility should be offered to the men to advance from the lowest to the highest ranks of the Forestry Commission. It must be in the knowledge of many present that they were constantly asked by parents "What " can my boy do to get into forestry?" and one had always to tell them that the prospects for young fellows, unless they were prepared to go to Oxford and spend a large sum of money on their scientific education, were comparatively small. He believed it would be a great advantage to the Commission, and to the community, if the fact were emphasised that the Commission itself was prepared to give facilities for men to rise from the lowest ranks to the highest. Then young fellows who wished to enter the profession would know that there was a prospect before them if they stuck to their work. At the same time the fathers who were at present engaged in the work would encourage their sons to go into the Service.

He was rather inspired to make the suggestion from what he had seen. The reader of the Paper that night was one of the products of The Surveyors' Institution. He was a man who had taken the diploma in Forestry. On his left was his old friend Professor Pritchard, who occupied a high position in the Forestry Commission, and who was another product of The Institution. One felt that The Institution was producing men who were capable of dealing with the question and who, with advantage to the Commission as well as to The Institution, might be introduced into the Service. He was of opinion that a very high technical education was not so essential for men who were taking divisional work as was the actual knowledge of conditions of planting, of land, and of dealing with men, and that wonderful faculty which it was difficult to describe, but which set apart the man who was accustomed to rural life and who knew how to grasp the problems attached to such life. The Institution was capable of producing such men.

Apart from that he thought the Forestry Commission were extraordinarily fortunate in the men they had working for them at the present time. Those men for the most part were not highly trained technical men, but were men with a vast amount of common-sense who knew how to deal with the difficult problems before them. They were men who where not following in the footsteps of some great organisation which had existed previously, but they belonged to an organisation which they themselves had helped to build up. He was sure Lord Lovat would bear him out when he said that they had seen in France men whose education had only been gained through the various branches of the simple lines of forestry, but who had proved themselves capable not only of carrying out very important and extensive forestry work, but of controlling bodies of men 3,000 and 4,000 strong. Therefore he thought there was ample justification for saying that there was every reason why the Commission should encourage men to start from the lowest branch, and so attract to the Service men of all ranks and conditions of life.

Sir George Courthope, Bart., M.P. (Associate), desired to add a word to the chorus of thanks and appreciation which had been accorded to Mr. Taylor for his excellent Paper. It was not only an interesting survey of what the Forestry Commission had been doing, but it was a valuable addition to anyone's library on forestry matters.

Before he went on to express a word or two of alarm at one or two aspects of the matter, he desired to say that, generally speaking, he thought the work of the Forestry Commission had been most admirably done. He was astonished at the results which they had been able to achieve with very meagre financial resources. He only wished they had had double the money to spend; he was sure it would be well spent. He was particularly pleased—and in saying so he did not wish to express disagreement with Mr. Leslie Wood—with the steps which the Commission were taking to create a forest population. He believed that in any country a forest population was of particular value. It was a population that did not move, and it was apt to be stable and conservative in the best sense of the word. It would be of great value to this country to have a genuine forest population spread about among the forests which were springing up under the hands of Lord Lovat and his colleagues.

Turning to two matters about which he felt some fears, one was the English oak. He knew that the Forrestry Commission realised that it was one of their duties to maintain the English oak, but he did not think that in the future the country would be satisfied with the amount of oak which the Commission were able to maintain. It would be a calamity if the English oak dropped out. It was quite impossible under present conditions for private enterprise to maintain the oak in any commercial quantities at all. The rapidity with which the oak was going had been very much accentuated during the last few years by the popularity of chestnut fencing. That might sound an indirect statement, but he would endeavour to prove it. The parts of the country which one hoped would always produce a certain quantity of good oak were those parts which had grown oak and ash standards over Spanish chestnut coppice, where the oak and ash standards owed their existence to natural regeneration, generally unassisted in any way. Now the chestnut coppice had become so valuable that the oak and ash standards had in many districts become an economic nuisance, and the first opportunity was taken, when an area of underwood was cleared in rotation, of getting rid of all the standards which threatened to reduce the value, ten or twelve years hence, of the Spanish chestnut coppice. He was afraid that was going to have a sad effect on the amount of oak which would be grown on private estates. Therefore he hoped that the Forestry Commission would be able to give some assurance that oak would be maintained by the Crown on a really substantial scale.

The other point on which he felt some fear was the following: He was far from satisfied with the rapidity of afforestation, or reafforestation, since the war by private enterprise. He did not suggest for a moment that it was the fault of the Forestry Commission. It was not; but he was quite certain, looking at forestry from a broad national point of view, that it was necessary for much more to be done by private enterprise. At the beginning of the war there were in this country close on three million acres of privately owned woods. Probably at least one million out of the three million was hardly worth the term "woodland" at all, and, roughly speaking, one million out of the three million—and that the best million—had been either clear felled or heavily cut over for war purposes. He did not think he was far wrong when he said that one-third of what we had was valueless and that half of the remainder had been heavily cut over or clear felled during the war. The amount of that which had been properly replanted was a triviality, and, what was more serious, there were a great many woods which had not been devastated during the war where the owners found themselves in financial difficulties and had cut off their forest staffs. Woods which used to be well kept were now gradually dropping into a deplorable state of devastation. What he wanted the Forestry Commission to do in the matter was to try to educate the woodland owner and the public as to what could be done with woods of that kind, if only the owners would have the courage to do their own conversion. Such people said

"Our woods have never paid." Probably they never had under the system of management which had been applied to them, but there was no reason why they should not pay if the people concerned would keep the timber merchants' profits in their own pockets, as could easily be done. He believed, if only the Forestry Commission would "rub it in" to the woodland owners of the country what could be done with their woodlands, and tell them that they were not necessarily uneconomic, even in the present hard times, that a great deal would be done not only to help impoverished families (he was not thinking of them), but to maintain the privately owned woodlands of the country under proper forest conditions. He hoped some serious attempt would be made to stir up private enterprise in the matter and to maintain that greatest feature of English woodlands, the oak.

Mr. R. L. Robinson, O.B.E. (Visitor), congratulated Mr. Taylor on having given The Institution a very straightforward and clear narrative of what the Forestry Commission was doing. Mr. Taylor had got into his short Paper a wonderful amount of information. Just a year ago there had been a meeting of the divisional and other officers. He had been looking through the proceedings of that meeting, and he found that they ran to 210 closely typed pages. He would not say that they did not contain more than Mr. Taylor had put into his Paper, but Mr. Taylor had made a most excellent resumé of the whole thing.

He would like to take up one matter of policy to which Sir George Courthope had referred, that was the question of planting oak. The Commission were fully aware of the importance of maintaining a proper supply of oak in this country. There was no doubt whatever in his own mind that it was only a question of time before all the oak woods would disappear, and he said that with a pretty wide knowledge of the countryside. There were practically no plantations under the age of 40 years. The great bulk of the oak woods which one saw had been planted either just before or just after the Napoleonic wars. The older ones were gone.

About 1852 they had stopped planting, and it had never been resumed to this day. So that the only young oak woods in this country were those in the ancient Crown forests, and also the small areas which the Forestry Commission themselves had made in the last few years. The reasons why the Forestry Commissioners were not planting more oak were varied. First of all they had in hand a considerable programme of planting conifers, and that programme was piling up at a really alarming rate. Whereas this year they were planting 18,000 acres, next year it would be 22,000, and pretty soon it would go up to 30,000 acres in one year. Not only was that area to be planted, but the land on which to plant had in part to be acquired. With a programme like that before one the question of planting oak was apt to recede into the background. But that was not the only reason. Another important reason was that in order to grow oak decently one must have the right sort of soil; that was to say, it was a more valuable class of soil than that on which first-class conifers could be grown. More expensive soil meant more money to buy land with. Also it was more difficult and more expensive to establish oak plantations, and when one had established them, thinnings came much later than in coniferous plantations; the thinnings were with difficulty saleable, and, finally, one had to wait a very long time before the crop was mature. That was a formidable set of difficulties, but it explained why the Forestry Commissioners had rather held their hands. While that was an excuse, it was not a reason, to his mind, why a properly balanced forest policy should not include the planting of oak on a considerable scale.

Mr. Maughan had given an instance of a Sitka spruce plantation, and had mentioned an annual increment of 500 cubic feet per acre per annum; that was to say, that particular wood was growing 500 cubic feet of timber to the acre during each of the five years which intervened between two measurements. He was afraid some of the members might have been incredulous of Mr. Maughan's figures, but they were authentic. It was a plot which had been measured by the Forestry Commission's experimental officer. The figures had been given to him (Mr. Robinson) at a recent meeting of research officers, and he had been so astounded at them that he had queried them; but he had been assured that not only were they right, but that they could be matched by another Sitka spruce plantation in another part of the country. Those were figures which showed a most astounding growth, such as had only been attained to his knowledge in the tropics and certain other places such as parts of New Zealand.

He had singled out these two points—oak and Sitka spruce—which were the extremes to show that there were two sides to forestry as to every picture.

Mr. H. A. Pritchard, O.B.E. (Fellow, Special Forestry Diploma), said he would like to join issue with Mr. Wood at the very start. He thought Mr. Wood was quite wrong in wishing to set up competition in rural districts for the comparatively small quantity of labour there was there. The Commission had no right whatever to compete with the staple industry of the country, namely, agriculture. He honestly thought that the payment of a minimum agricultural wage was a very sound policy. It attracted no one except the men who probably could see more advantage in the facilities which the Commission offered, to undertake work which was paid for by results. After all said and done, it was on that policy that the Commission had been able to show such satisfactory results from a costing point of view. There was no reason whatever why any man joining the Service, if he was prepared to work hard—and it really meant hard work—should not gain promotion. At present many men—young men in particular—seemed to have lost all sense of what was due from them in return for their opportunities and wages. It was extremely difficult for him, at the present time, to find a young man on whom he could rest any great measure of responsibility, and he said that after handling hundreds of them, and it had caused him a feeling of great despondency. Looking round him he failed to find men who were prepared to undertake work and responsibility to the same extent and degree which in his own young days he himself had had to shoulder.

With regard to the question of housing, he thought Mr. Wood could not have had any real knowledge of what the Commission were doing. Every encouragement was given by the Commissioners to their officers to house their staffs, and by the use of materials which lay to the hand they had created what might not pass the ordinary building by-laws of every local authority, but what really turned out to be exceptionally good houses, which, when occupied, proved of the greatest advantage and comfort to those who were occupying them, at a very reasonable cost. More than that nobody could be asked to do with the present congested condition in the towns.

With regard to Sir George Courthope's remarks, he had felt a little fear when Sir George had started talking about oak, and especially oak and ash standards. He had thought that possibly Sir George had been going to accuse him of doing something which he was prepared to plead guilty to, in Sir George's own district. There, there was a case where possibly the Commission might, looked at from a broad point of view, have cleared the chestnut coppice over very large areas, and planted oak. Oak did grow there, and grew remarkably well; but while it looked well standing, it was all coming down very much shaken. On the other hand, chestnut coppice could be sold at a large sum per acre, and on those particular areas where the oak was badly shaken, and where there was a fair stand of coppice, surely the policy should be to remove the decrepit standards and fill up the area with chestnut, and from the revenue derived enable the Commission, possibly at no very distant date, to convert the whole of the remaining area, of which a large proportion was stocked with worthless coppice, into thriving oak plantations.

Sir John Oakley (Past-President) said he did not profess for a moment to be a forestry expert; he was a land agent, surveyor, and valuer; but he had had a good deal to do with the management of estates of all kinds, including large areas of woodland. He rose to his feet in consequence of Sir George Courthope's remarks. He understood Sir George to say that oak cultivation was being rather neglected by the Commission, and that if it was properly brought before the landowners it could be shown that it could be made a commercial proposition. He had hoped that Sir George was going a little further and would prove to him how it could be made a commercial proposition from a landowner's point of view. Mr. Robinson, following Sir George, had shown what were the difficulties in connection with oak timber—the extra expense involved, the better quality of land required, the postponed period before any return was possible, and so on. That, to his own mind—added to the very heavy taxation on landowners at the present time—was the reason why the latter had not been able to keep up the old traditions in the way of maintaining oak plantations. Lord Lovat was going, he hoped, to give them a lot of interesting facts and information, and he had ventured to rise before his lordship in the hope that perhaps he might be able to tell them how he (the speaker) could go to his clients and show them any practical way whereby the planting of oak could be dealt with as a commercial proposition.

There was another point in dealing with hard-woods, namely, the restrictions placed upon the use of timber by tenants for life and trustees. Only last week he had been over several hundred acres of woodlands in Warwickshire which were going to rack and ruin largely because there had been no money available to do what was necessary, and he doubted if there would be any in the next or the following generation. That timber was getting stag-headed; it was decaying, and it was far beyond its best commercial value. The estate could have been saved by cutting, say, 20 or 30 thousand pounds' worth of timber and spending the proceeds on improvements and upkeep; but according to the then legislation such proceeds could not be used in that way. The timber could be used in repairs, but the proceeds of the sale of the timber could not be used in maintaining the estate. That had been another difficulty in dealing with oak timber.

Lord LOVAT (Visitor) said he always felt, whenever he came inside the hall of The Institution, that the Forestry Commission owed a very sincere and continual vote of thanks to the Institution. Sir George Courthope would bear him out when he said that The Institution had helped the Commission at every stage of its career; and he could assure not only the President but the Council and a large number of the members that the Commission owed them a grateful meed of thanks, and he had great pleasure, in the name of the Commission, in offering those thanks to The Institution that night.

The Paper was a most interesting one. He knew the great difficulty there was in attempting to condense so large a subject into a short Paper and still make it interesting, but Mr. Taylor had certainly achieved that in no small degree.

Having said that, he would plunge straight away into one or two of the controversial points which had been raised in the course of the discussion. He was not going to follow Mr. Maughan into the question of the pure growing of larch and the mixture with larch of Scotch fir. He might say that although a considerable number of his colleagues were against him, he was inclining more and more, as he got on in years, to agree that larch grown with Scotch fir and not pure was more likely to be free of disease. That, however, was a matter which the Commission was investigating, and possibly, in a year or two's time, there might be a large amount of information on the subject gained from a considerable area.

Another point raised by Mr. Maughan had been the question of peat. Growth in peat was one of the most important investigations which the Commission had before them. When the whole of the peat research was published, it would certainly add considerably to the present knowledge on the subject and be of real value to planters in Great Britain, and especially in Scotland where there was so much of it.

He must join issue with his friend Mr. Wood on the subject of small holdings, on which question he would like, with the members' permission, to say a word or two. The Commission had considered their policy of small holdings very carefully. He came from a country where there were a great many small holdings, and it had been found there that the most successful of the crofter settlements were those where the crofter had outside work to do, so that in the winter they could work in the woods, in the summer they could prosecute their callings, whether it was fishing or crofting work, and could come back again in the autumn to their forestry work. Holdings were being created—five holdings for every thousand acres—only in cases where the Commission could guarantee a man 150 days' work in the year as a minimum, and where they were only planting the land at such a rate that the planting would not be finished before the filling work had been begun. The Commission guaranteed, as he had said, 150 days' work during the year, which, they believed, gave the small holder a real chance; he would have his wages certainly in the winter, and he would have whatever he got from his small holding for the rest of the year.

Another question which had been raised was that of promotion from the ranks. The Commission were willing that there should be the opportunity given to the forester of going on from the school to forest work in the position of a second-grade forester or foreman, then first-grade forester, then head forester, and then, if the man was worth it, joining the forest-officer ranks. As the Service grew, those opportunities would increase. There was already one man who, at his own expense, was going to the university and who, it was hoped, would return in the course of time as a forest officer. The Commission believed that that was a matter which should be encouraged, and he felt certain that, as their ranks grew, those opportunities would increase rather than diminish; but they required, and it was essential for them to have, highly technically trained officers for certain lines of research and other work, as well as practical men of the administrative class, who, of course, would always comprise the greater bulk of the forest Service.

Mr. Robinson had dealt with the point of oak growing, which had been raised by Sir George Courthorpe. The Forestry Commission considered it their duty to grow oak and also to grow large-sized timber, because probably in the future large-sized timber of all sorts would not be grown except by a body which had that duty to do. The private proprietor would more and more grow his shorter rotation crops, as it was there he would find his money. If he might be permitted to advise Sir John Oakley, he would say that Sir John should tell his clients rather to go in for the coniferous timber.

On the question of the duty of the State in connection with propaganda work, Sir George Courthope had said that in addition to the financial assistance that should be given to proprietors, the Commission ought to undertake some form of propaganda work to induce more landowners to plant. It was certainly the endeavour of the Commission to try to get landowners to plant to the greatest extent possible. Members were aware of the grants which had already been given. Those had been given in a way which, it was thought, would give the best results. There, again, The Institution had helped by constructive criticism of the circulars which had been issued so as to make those circulars intelligible and easily workable. The Commission were carrying out propaganda work, but not direct propaganda work in the sense that one of the first things they had undertaken had been a census of woodlands, in which work The Institution had helped so much. They believed that when that census was published, and when the figures of timber supplies in the world were ready, it would show what was the timber position in the world as well as in this country. The Commission hoped then that those concerned would be able to form their own judgment, not as to what prices would be to-day or to-morrow, but whether or not timber was likely to become more valuable or not at the time when the trees now being planted would be cut down.

Mr. C. F. Stone (Fellow, Special Forestry Diploma) said he would like to say a word with regard to oak and other hard-woods. In reading through the Paper and the description of the Commission's work he found it was practically confined to conifers, and it seemed to him that the reasons given for not planting hard-woods were just the reasons that landowners would give why the Commissioners should plant. The Commissioners could plant more or less for posterity, and it seemed that the landowners would be encouraged if they saw that oak and other hard-woods and broad-leaved trees such as ash, sycamore and poplars were being regularly planted by the Commission so as to give them some guide as to whether it was worth doing. Large areas of oak had been cut down and had not been replanted. If the Commissioners would take over some of those woodlands and replant them, or experiment, if necessary, on them, and give some encouragement to the landowners to plant hard-woods, then, if it was successful, we should have oak again in the future. One could not at present advise private owners to plant oak because the return was so very far ahead; but even if it did cost money, he thought the Commissioners should take some area in an oak-growing district and show what could be done, and thus help to ensure a supply of oak for the future.

Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Member of Council) mentioned an estate in the west of England, for which he had acted as agent some years ago, which was on the fringe of Dartmoor at an elevation of 700 or 800 feet, vast tracts of which had been planted. In 1840 the landowner had received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament for his patriotic act in planting those vast tracts with larch and pine on the fringe of Dartmoor. But times had changed, and in his own opinion private owners would never be persuaded to plant largely—even conifers which had a fairly quick return—because a landowner to-day had no assurance that even 35 years hence the land would belong to him, or to his son, or his grandson. It was that fear which would always, in his opinion, in these days, prevent the private planting of estates. Therefore he urged that the large corporations on their gathering grounds, and the State, through the Forestry Commission, should more and more enlarge their planting, because it was not fair to expect landowners to plant their private estates if the continuance in their family of their land was precarious. Therefore he hoped that the State and the corporations would take the place of the landowners and plant all they could.

All the forestry he ever knew he had learned at the feet of that great forester Sir William Schlich, and what Mr. Taylor had said that night Sir William had preached 35 years ago. When he (the speaker) had been almost a pupil he remembered Sir William saying, "You will never "get successful forestry in England or Scotland until you "associate it with a policy of small holdings." Sir William had said that 35 years ago, and had preached it for 35 years, and it gave him great pleasure to hear Lord Lovat still preaching that same doctrine.

The PRESIDENT said that before putting the vote of thanks he would like to thank Lord Lovat and the other visitors present for having given The Institution the great benefit of their views on the question under discusssion. The Institution felt very much indebted to them. The subject was one in which he took a very great interest, although he could not profess to have had any great practical experience of it. He was sorry the attendance that night was small. The majority of members who lived within easy reach of The Institution were interested, perhaps, in other matters; some of them might be more familiar with iron railings than with either chestnut palings or oak standards. That, however, did not apply to the great body of the members of The Institution who were spread throughout the country, and he would like to say to the reader of the Paper, and to those who had made speeches that night, that the attendance at the meeting was no indication whatever of the great interest and the great value which the Paper and the discussion would be to the large body of members throughout the country.

He should like also to thank Lord Lovat for the remarks he made about The Institution, and to say that The Surveyors' Institution would always be very ready to help in every possible way in propaganda work, or in making known to landowners and to agents what was being done, and what were the aims of the Commission. If there was anything The Surveyors' Institution could do, it would only be too delighted to do it.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. W. L. Taylor (Fellow, Special Forestry Diploma), in reply, thanked the members very sincerely indeed for the kind way in which they had received his Paper, the writing of which had given him a great deal of pleasure. Especially had he to thank Mr. John Maughan and Mr. Leslie Wood for their exceedingly kind remarks. The discussion had been so interesting and so general that it left him very little to reply to.

Mr. Maughan advocated 4-ft. spacing as against the Commission's 4 feet 6 inches. [Mr. Maughan interjected that he had mentioned 4 feet for Scotch fir and 5 feet for spruce.] What he really wanted to say was that the Commission's spacing for spruce and for Douglas fir, and for certain other species, was even more than 5 feet at times where the nature of the ground allowed.

The remarks made by Mr. Maughan as to frost and the planting on hillsides were very interesting. No doubt in many cases it would, from the frost point of view alone, be advantageous to start from the top and work downwards, but there were other considerations. From motives of economy that was not at all times practicable.

With regard to foxes, he could assure Mr. Maughan that the Commissioners and their staffs all looked after the fox; he was a great friend of theirs.

Mr. Leslie Wood had emphasised the necessity of attracting the country-bred man from the town. They recognised the importance of that, and were doing all they could to get the right type of man from the town back to the land.

The question of the growth of oak had been thoroughly discussed. The Forestry Commission's present programme included the planting of 10,000 acres of hard-woods, most of which would be oak. They had already made a start with the 2,254 acres which had been dealt with already, most of which again was planted with oak.

On page 95 of his Paper he had stated: "To public bodies the maximum grant "for planting is £4 10*s.* per acre . . . ." It should be noted that the scheme of grants to public bodies hitherto available was withdrawn, and that there was now no distinction in amount between the grants payable to public bodies and private individuals.

The meeting then terminated.

RATING AND VALUATION ACT, 1925.

By E. M. Konstam, C.B.E., K.C.

To be read at the Fourth Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution, 8th February, 1926.

The Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, is now law, and although it does not come into active operation until 1st April, 1927, the changes which it brings about are so many and so important that the fourteen months or so which will elapse before the appointed day will not be too long a period for authorities to prepare for the introduction of those changes, or for surveyors and other professional advisers of the owners and occupiers of property to become familiar with them.

Of the controversies which purported to rage round the Bill while it was before Parliament, there is happily no need to speak. But before considering those points in the Act which are of most interest to surveyors, I may, perhaps, be allowed to take the opportunity of paying a respectful tribute to the draftsman or draftsmen; they have produced an Act which is remarkably comprehensive, which (in addition to the matters of broad policy dealt with) stops many gaps and corrects many errors in the existing law; and which is singularly lucid and, at the same time, concise, so far as those merits can be attained under Parliamentary conditions.

Speaking broadly, although certain reforms of great importance are enacted, the standards of valuation with which we are familiar remain the same. The definitions of "gross" and "rateable value" which appear in Sections 22 and 68 of the Act of 1925 are a composite of those in the Acts of 1836, 1862, and 1869. Unfortunately the words

"taking one year with another," which in the metropolitan definitions qualify the expression "the rent that the hypothetical tenant may be expected to pay," and which were at first inserted in the present Act, have been dropped, and the less lucid phrase "from year to year" has been substituted. This was done, as I gather, to allay some anxiety that seems to have been entertained that the words "taking one year with another" might perpetuate the pre-war valuation of industrial and residential property to the detriment of agricultural land. As the House of Lords has held on two occasions, separated by an interval of thirty years, that the definitions in the Acts of 1836 and 1869 have the same effect, it is obvious that that fear is groundless, or, if there is any ground for it, that it is not to be removed by the choice of an obscurer phrase. The weakness of the words "from year to year" is that they do not bring out clearly that the tenant is not supposed to be confined to a single year's tenancy, but is assumed to have a prospect of continuance; however, as that principle rests upon a decision of the Court of Appeal under the Act of 1836, there is no doubt of its being still applicable.

In any event, change definitions as you will, human nature is still the same, and it is probably safe to prophesy that assessments will remain (to a varying extent, it is true) on a basis of pre-war prices and rents until surveyors, assessment committees, Quarter Sessions—in fact, the British public at large—gets accustomed to post-war conditions and forgets that they were ever abnormal, or that ten shillings ever purchased what now cannot be bought for less than a pound!

To come back to "gross value"; though the correlated definitions of "net annual value" and "rateable value," and the provision for statutable deductions, are to be found in Section 22, the definition of "gross value" is placed somewhat bleakly apart in Section 68. It is followed by a proviso for the exclusion of payments for services rendered, which renders inapplicable a somewhat doubtful decision under the Metropolitan Act that additional payments made by tenants of flats and suites, for lighting and cleaning and other services rendered by the landlord, are to be added to the actual rent in order to arrive at gross value. Incidentally, the proviso may be found to afford some compensation to owners of blocks of flats and offices in lieu of the advantage which the footnote to the Third Schedule of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, gives such owners in the metropolis, of being excepted from the rigid scale of deductions.

The isolated position in which the definition of "gross "value" has been placed is possibly intended to emphasise what appears to me the "crowning mercy" of the Act, namely, that it is no longer universally necessary to arrive at a gross value. In fact, this is only to be done where the scale of deductions in Part I. of the Second Schedule applies; and as the amounts of deduction in that scale are not maxima but fixed sums or fixed percentages, in those cases where the gross value has to be ascertained the net annual value stands in a defined relation to it, so that it must be immaterial whether the valuer arrives first at the gross or at the net.

The scale does not apply to "mills, manufactories or "premises of a similar character used wholly or mainly for "industrial purposes" (which must include mines, though they might have been specified) nor to any portion of a "railway, dock, canal, gas, water, electricity or other public "utility undertaking" which is valued as such; nor to tithe or tithe rent-charge or other substitutes for tithe; nor to sporting rights severed and let; for none of the above, therefore, need a gross value be ascertained. Some people may think it a pity that other classes of what are often called "special properties"—for instance, theatres, race-courses, licensed premises—are not given a similar privilege; but in view of what has just been pointed out, this really resolves itself into the question whether the scale allowances are sufficient for premises of those classes, a subject on which I have not the presumption before this audience to express any views of my own.

As a legally enforceable matter, a scale of deductions is, of course, a novelty outside the metropolis. The deductions allowed are intended to cover everything which was formerly included in the "probable average annual cost of the "repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary "to maintain the hereditament in a state to command the "rent"; there can, for instance, be no additional deduction of a sinking fund for the ultimate renewal of a structure. But one exception is allowed; special provision is made for deducting separately the average annual amount of drainage and embankment rates and charges where these are payable, so that the old question whether they are a landlord's or a tenant's liability will not arise in future.

Although it was probably illegal to do so, many assessment committees have been in the habit of using percentage rates (fixed by themselves) for calculating the statutable deductions on ordinary classes of property; even in a single union such a scale must operate to the disadvantage of hereditaments which require exceptionally heavy repairs, and still more so in cases where the repairs are not only heavy in themselves but heavy in relation to the rent. This unfortunate result must be accentuated where a single scale is made applicable over the whole country; though, in that which is scheduled to the Act of 1925, the difficulty arising from the relative variation of rents is, to some extent, modified by the specifying of actual cash sums as minimum deductions where the hereditament includes no land unbuilt upon (other than a garden). The advantages of such a scale are undoubtedly ease of calculation, and the saving of time and labour to assessment and rating authorities and their officers; but it is a nice question whether these are not outweighed by the undue burden which must necessarily be placed on some of the ratepayers affected as compared with the rest, when a figure arrived at by means of averages is applied to the whole class.

Either, then, the gross value is ascertained and reduced by the scale in Part I. of the Second Schedule to a "net "annual value," or the "net annual value" is found in the first instance. The net annual value is our old friend of the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836—older than that even, as we all know—which most of us have been accustomed to call "rateable value." We must not treat these as convertible terms in future; for agricultural land, farm buildings, and market garden buildings, are to have their net annual value reduced by 75 per cent., and the result is to be called "rateable value." As regards agricultural land, this is merely a changed mode of giving effect to the three-fourths exemption already enjoyed under the Agricultural Rates Acts, 1896 and 1923. As regards farm buildings and glass-houses, &c., in market gardens, the concession is new, although glass-houses did enjoy such an exemption under the Public Health Act. The amendment which brings it about was made at a late stage in the passing of the Bill; and the separate ascertaining and entry of the value of farm buildings may give rise to some little difficulty in view of the familiar provisions of Section 5 of the Act of 1896, which remain in force and unamended, especially when it is remembered that the farmhouse itself obtains no reduction, and must, therefore, have a separate value assigned to it, and a separate entry. This difficulty will not arise as to those market gardens which consist wholly of glass erections.

In addition to agricultural land and buildings, those other classes of property in urban areas which enjoyed a three-fourths exemption for general district rates and local rates of a like nature, such as railways, land covered with water, tithe rent-charge, and so on, are to obtain that abatement by means of a reduction between net annual and rateable value. But the reduction will not, as in the case of agricultural land, be a clean 75 per cent., because a consolidated rate, called "the general rate," is to be raised in lieu, not of the general district rate alone but of other rates as well, like the borough rate, to which no abatement of the kind applied. Therefore the proper percentage of reduction applicable to the consolidation of these rates must be ascertained for each county borough and urban dictrict; and this is to be done by a "scheme" or "special scheme" made under Part III. of the Second Schedule.

At this point it may be worth while to note that existing exemptions are preserved, whether created under statutes of general application or under local Acts, including provisions for the making of valuations on exceptional principles, like those often obscure enactments to be found in Canal and other Acts, by which the land which forms part of the undertaking is to be valued as if it were in the same state as the surrounding lands. Schemes are to be made for the perpetuation of those privileges or exemptions, unless they are surrendered; by a novel provision this may be done by agreement between the rating authority and all persons interested.

The Crown exemption remains intact; and, as before, the value on which the Crown contribution is computed is to be entered in the valuation list as the rateable value of the hereditament to which it applies.

The concession as to farm buildings was obtained as a counterpoise to the exemption of "chattel" machinery and plant. This latter is a total exemption; and though logically no doubt there was much to be said for the greater discrimination that was at one time proposed, as a practical matter we may be glad of the clean cut that has been made. The long series of decisions on this subject has gradually discounted one test after another—the test of passing on a demise—the test of attachment to the soil or structure, and so on—until there could no longer be found any authoritative guide as to what machinery should be "taken into "account," or, as we have been ultimately allowed to say, should be "rated," and what left out of account. That being so, the Minister wisely adopted the recommendation of the Shortt Committee to specify in a catalogue (if I may so describe it) those items of machinery and plant that are to be dealt with, rather than to lay down any principle of division that might be susceptible of more than one interpretation. The Third Schedule to the Act provides this catalogue in skeleton. It is to be elaborated and set out in greater detail by a committee to be appointed, but they will have no power to add any classes of machinery or plant to those which appear in the schedule, nor to adopt any other test than inclusion in those classes. Whatever items of machinery and plant appear in this catalogue will be rated, as Smith v. Willesden lays down. Apart from that, nothing is to be rated or to be taken into account but the land and the structure, with all their advantages or disabilities.

The provision just discussed is not to affect the valuation of hereditaments assessed on a basis of profits ; nor is it to extend what is "under the law and practice as now in "force" deemed to be the tenant's capital of such an undertaking. In fairly recent times two strong courts of Quarter Sessions for the same county, each presided over by very learned judges, trying two railway rating appeals within five years of each other, agreed only in deciding that the law left it open to them to consider as a question of fact whether machinery (which might be taken into account under the authority of Kirby v. Hunslet Union) should be included in the tenant's capital or not; and disagreed diametrically in the answer to that question of fact, one court including the value of the machinery in the computation, and the other excluding it. In these circumstances it may be easy to ascertain how the "law" stands at the commencement of this Act; but to know this carries one no further—and what the "practice" is no man can say.

The points at which the new Act impinges on the present standards of value have now been indicated. But the greater part of the Act deals with authorities and their powers and duties, and with methods of procedure. The actual composition of rating or assessment authorities is not a matter of interest either to you or to myself as professional men, and I need not therefore dwell upon the provisions dealing with personnel. Suffice it to say that, in regard to the service of notice of appeal, traps will no longer be set for the unwary who have failed to enquire whether the local authority and the overseers are one or twain; or whether the council have the powers of overseers, or only appoint them. The overseers disappear, and in every case (subject to a modification in rural areas which need not concern us) the local council is the rating authority for the whole urban or rural area, with the powers and duties of preparing valuation lists, making and enforcing rates, receiving notices of appeal, and so forth.

The union is no longer to be the unit of jurisdiction for assessment purposes; new assessment areas are to be formed, with new assessment committees, who are to have much the same functions as the old, but are free from the control of the guardians or any other body; and in matters where the present committees have to seek consent, such as the appointment of valuers or the resisting of appeals, the new assessment committees will act independently. There are to be county valuation committees with advisory powers, and with the power of appearing on objections or appeals after giving special notice to the occupier concerned; and a central valuation committee for the whole country, also with advisory powers.

The rating authorities take over the officers of the overseers, and the new assessment committees take over the officers employed under the existing committees, including any valuers appointed under Section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868. In addition there is power to employ such rating officers and valuation officers as the authority or committee think fit.

The new valuation lists are to be prepared by the rating authorities. They may employ valuers to give them advice or assistance in connection with the valuation of any hereditaments, but not to make and sign the list in their stead. Rating authorities must call for returns of particulars from owners and occupiers, and assessment committees may do so. Penalties are incurred if the required returns are not furnished. The provisions for deposit, inspection, objection, differ in detail, it is true, from those which now prevail, but not in principle. The assessment committees will hear objections, as they do now, and—as at present—they may make alterations as they think proper, whether for the purpose of meeting an objection or not. Notice of objection, it may be remarked, will have to be served on the assessment committee only; it is their duty, and not the objector's, to serve copies on the rating authority, and on the occupier if he is not the objector. Any valuer employed by the assessment committee may be called as a witness on the hearing of the objection, but he may not remain with the committee while they are considering their decision. The objector and the occupier are forthwith to have notice of the decision, which under the present law does not invariably occur. Notice of any other alteration is given to persons interested, and they have further opportunity of making objection ; but there is no re-deposit and only one approval of the list, though it is called "the final approval."

The list is made conclusive of values for general and special rates, and appeals on question of value will be appeals against the decision of the assessment committee, as they are now in the metropolis, and not against the rate, as they are now in the country generally. The time-honoured maxim "One rate, one objection, one appeal" will thus become a thing of the past. Appeals against rates will only be competent (as in London) on questions which cannot be set right by amending the valuation list, as, for instance, the invalidity of the rate itself, apart from the list on which it is based.

Moreover, the jurisdiction of the Quarter Sessions to which appeals in regard to the lists are brought will be continuous. There will therefore be no necessity for abstruse calculations in order to discover the "next "practicable Sessions," and no irremediable calamity where the right answer is not found. The would-be appellant has only to give his notice within twenty-one days of the final approval, and the appeal will be set down for the next sitting held more than thirty-five days after the final approval ; it may be adjourned on application, but the notice must be given, and if it is not, there will be no saving the situation by entry and respite. If an authority is the appellant, the occupier may avoid the risk of having to pay costs, by claiming to be called as a witness without appearing as a respondent.

In counties, the appeals will be heard by a standing committee of Quarter Sessions, with a chairman appointed annually ; not less than five or more than seven justices may take part. The committee may sit anywhere within their jurisdiction ; and any party may be represented before them by a solicitor, in any case where the rateable value does not exceed £100. In quarter-sessions boroughs the Recorder remains the sole judge.

New provisions are made for arbitration which are much simpler and should be more easily workable than those at present in force. It may perhaps be regretted that the vexed question whether an assessment committee has power to refer an assessment to arbitration while an objection to it is still pending before the committee has not been settled; but after an appeal has been brought, the appellant and respondents may by consent refer the whole matter in dispute, or any subsidiary issue, to arbitration, or may, by consent, appoint a person to value any hereditament. It will not be necessary, as it now is, to obtain an order of the High Court or of the Quarter Sessions for this purpose. The arbitrator or valuer will be agreed on by the parties; as to an arbitrator, if the parties fail to agree, the appointment will be made by the President of The Surveyors' Institution. The valuation made by a valuer will be binding for the purposes of the appeal; but the award of an arbitrator will not be final and conclusive on all questions of fact and law involved, unless the parties specially agree that it shall be so. If they do not, he will be able to state a case for the High Court as a point of law in the course of the reference, or to state his award in the form of a special case, as authorised by the Arbitration Act, 1889; that Act applies in other respects also.

The first new valuation lists under the Act are to come into force on the 1st April or 1st October, 1928, or 1929; the second on either of those dates in 1932, 1933, or 1934; the succeeding lists at intervals of five years. For the rectification of the lists in the intervening periods, a system of "proposals" for amendment is introduced, which avoids the drawbacks inherent in the rigid metropolitan methods of provisional and supplemental lists, by allowing amendment even if the original list was incorrect when it was made, and by allowing amendment for any cause and at any time. Separate provision is made for the correction of rates, and for the insertion in them of new or newly occupied hereditaments, and so on; and where rates are thus amended otherwise than by the correcting of Ministerial errors, the amendment of the poor rate is to be followed by a proposal for the amendment of the list.

There are many other matters of interest dealt with in the Act; the rating of owners follows in its broad lines the system familiar under the Act of 1869, but (in addition to certain differences of detail) its scope is widened, and it is made applicable, for instance, to cottages let rent free, while in certain circumstances an occupying owner may receive some allowance; there are new provisions enabling discount to be allowed for prompt payment of rates, and rates to be recovered from under-tenants and lodgers who may recoup themselves against their landlords; the method of levying precepts for contributions by county councils, boards of guardians, and other bodies, is wholly changed; and there will be no county-rate basis after the first new valuation lists have all come into force. But I must not dwell on these topics; and if I have directed attention to some of those salient points in the Act which are of more immediate interest to members of this Institution, I shall have carried out what I conceive to have been their desire when they laid my pleasant task upon me.

TRANSACTIONS

OF THE

SURVEYORS' INSTITUTION

SESSION 1925-1926.

AT THE ORDINARY GENERAL MEETING

Held on Monday, 8th February, 1926,

A DISCUSSION took place on a Paper entitled

RATING AND VALUATION ACT, 1925,

By E. M. Konstam, C.B.E., K.C.

Mr. John D. Wallis (President) in the Chair.

Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Member of Council), in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Konstam, said he felt it a great honour to be allowed to do so. Mr. Konstam's Paper was a very excellent and lucid one, and he was sure he expressed the opinion of all the members when he said how grateful he was that a counsel of Mr. Konstam's eminence in the law of rating should take the trouble to attend a meeting of The Institution and educate the members in that subject.

It was a complicated subject, and admitted of a good deal of discussion. He therefore proposed to deal very briefly with a few points only. Mr. Konstam said it was probably safe to prophesy that assessments would remain on a basis of pre-war prices, whatever might be the new law. Personally he thought surveyors should give serious consideration to that question. If the first valuation list came into force in April, 1928, that would be nine and a half years after the Armistice, and by that time surveyors ought to have put on their thinking caps and discovered what was the present-day value without harking back to pre-war. Many classes of property had gone up and many classes of property had gone down in value as a result of the war, and he hoped a fresh start would be made when the first valuation list came into force, and that people would get away from the old shibboleth of pre-war prices.

He was glad Mr. Konstam said that mines might be looked on as "mills, manufactories, or premises of a similar "character," in the case of which no gross value had to be found. It seemed to be a difficult point, because if bricks were manufactured from brick earth, that was no doubt a manufacturing process; but if one simply sold raw sand or raw coal, there was not much manufacturing about it. However, if Mr. Konstam said that in his opinion mines did not require a gross to be found, a statement such as that, with Mr. Konstam's authority behind it, would carry great weight, and he hoped it would never be upset. It was a great advantage to restrict the category of hereditaments for which a gross value had to be found.

With regard to drainage rate, Mr. Konstam said: "The "old question of whether the drainage rate is a landlord's "or tenant's liability will not arise in future." Personally he was not at all sure it would not, because under Section 22, Sub-section (1), paragraph (a), it said that the drainage rate had to be deducted between the gross value and the rateable value if it was a landlord's rate, but if it was a tenant's rate, naturally, as was the case with ordinary rates, it was to be deducted before gross value. If a rate was deducted before gross value, the gross was depressed; consequently the 5 per cent. deduction between gross and rateable on agricultural land would be taken from a smaller gross value than if the gross value contained the drainage rate; so it would still be a question of whether the drainage rate was a landlord's or a tenant's rate, and whether the gross value was to contain the rate or not. It would affect deductions from gross to rateable for agricultural land.

Mr. Konstam said very truly that many assessment committees had been in the habit of using percentage rates of deductions. He thought Mr. Konstam might have gone so far as to say that all assessment committees had their scales. If that were so, he thought one scale for the whole country would be better—it promoted uniformity. One scale for the whole country would be better than so many assessment committees, so many scales.

There was another point about the scale of deductions which he would like to mention. Mr. Konstam said an undue burden might be thrown on some of the ratepayers if there were fixed deductions between gross and rateable for repairs. Personally he was not so sure about there being any undue burden in that case. He had always said that the truest criterion of the ability to pay between individual ratepayers of the same class was not what the net income of the property was as received by the landlord, but the gross rent which the tenant paid. If A lived in quite a new house, with brick walls and a slate roof, and his rent was £100 a year, and B lived in a thatched house, also at £100 a year, he suggested the comparative ability to pay of those two tenants was properly measured as equal, because they both paid the same gross rent. If deductions from gross to rateable were made in respect of repairs, an anomalous position arose. If the landlord of the good slate-roofed house did not send anyone to repair it for years, but the owner of the thatched cottage had to send someone once a month to patch up a repair, that was really irrelevant—it had nothing to do with the tenant's ability to pay rent. He therefore thought that fixed deductions from the gross, to arrive at the rateable value, were proper. It was really like paying on the gross, less a fixed fraction. Lord Dunedin's Committee in Scotland reported that the gross rent or value that a tenant did pay or should pay was the better measure of his comparative ability to pay rates. If it was the better measure, and if it was impolitic to suggest that people should pay rates on gross value—and it would be an unhappy Government that tried to put that into force—if rates were paid on a fixed proportion of gross value (namely, less a fixed percentage), it would be, he thought, more just. He therefore thought a fixed scale of deductions was a better method than leaving the matter to the judgment of individual assessment committees.

There was one question he would very much like to ask the author. He would like to know, referring to Subsection (4) of Section 31 of the Act, whether that subsection would carry out what he thought it was evidently intended to carry out, namely, preventing appellants from accepting the gross and appealing against the rateable on the ground that the deductions were insufficient. He believed he was right in saying the section was intended to stop that practice, and he hoped Mr. Konstam would be able to say that it had succeeded in doing so. If not, surveyors would be very much distressed.

Mr. Konstam pointed out that when rating a farm in future it would be necessary to have a separate entry for the farmhouse, a separate entry for the farm buildings, and a separate entry for the agricultural land. Although that seemed a laborious and tedious arrangement, it was essentially necessary, because unless the buildings were assessed separately there would be no scale of deductions to apply from the Second Schedule of the Act. It was of assistance to agriculture that there should be the separate entries to which he had referred. For instance, taking the case of a farmhouse worth £30 gross and farm buildings worth £38 gross, together that was £68. If they were assessed together at £68 gross, the deduction from gross to rateable under the scale would be one-fifth, or £13; but if the farmhouse were assessed separately at £30 and the farm buildings separately at £38, one was entitled to take a quarter off each figure, making a total deduction of £16. It therefore favoured agriculture that the farmhouse and farm buildings should be separately assessed.

Coming to the question of the rating of machinery, he differed somewhat from Mr. Konstam, who said: "The "Minister wisely adopted the recommendation of the Shortt "Committee to specify in a catalogue . . . . those items of "machinery and plant that are to be dealt with," and that did not fall within the exempting clauses of the Act. The Shortt Committee specially stated they did not think it would be practicable to compile what Mr. Konstam very cleverly and wisely called a catalogue. That Committee thought it would be much better to specify the classes of rateable machinery in an Act of Parliament, leaving it to certain referees to decide whether a particular machine or particular plant fell within or without the classes so specified. The Government in its better judgment, however, had stated in the Act that a Committee was to draw up "a statement setting out in detail all the machinery and "plant which appears to the Committee to fall within the "classes specified." He hoped he was wrong, but he felt sure that that Committee would find a difficulty in compiling an encyclopædia which would cover every kind of machinery and plant falling within that definition. If they did compile such an encyclopædia, it would naturally be full of the obvious which no one would dream of looking for in it. If all power-producing machinery and plant was to be rated, no one was going to look up gas engines or steam engines or boilers in the encyclopædia. He hoped the Committee would be able to prepare the statement required of them, which would become practically a section of an Act of Parliament and decide the matter. He wished the Committee all success.

He was sorry that Parliament in its wisdom had made rather a mess of some of the phraseology which the Departmental Committee on Machinery recommended to the Government. It must be remembered there was such a thing as a building, and such a thing as a structure, and such things as plant and machinery, and if it was said that certain plant and machinery was not to be rated, one must be careful to see one was not disrating buildings and structures. The Departmental Committee thought of lifts, for example, and asked themselves whether lifts were plant or buildings. They decided it would be better to settle the question once and for all and to call them buildings, so that the Committee said in effect that all lifts should be rated. Parliament in its wisdom, however, decided that passenger lifts only were to be rateable plant. That would leave the House of Lords to decide whether a goods lift was part of a building or whether it was plant. The same was true of coke ovens. There might be a long range of coke ovens, and to avoid any question of law the Departmental Committee advised that all coke ovens should be rated, but Parliament had said that "such parts" should be rated and "such parts" should not, which would make it very difficult; one would have to say, "Certain parts of this coke oven which move "round and round shall not be rated, but such parts as are "in the nature of a structure shall be."

Mr. Konstam said that the exemption of certain machinery from rating was not to affect special properties. At first sight it might be thought that railways, water, gas and other companies, and so on, should have their machinery exempted in the same way as private occupiers and owners. However, if that machinery were exempted, it would only result in increasing what might be called the rateable value of the monopoly part of it. If from receipts and expenses it was found that the rateable value of a gas works was £20,000, one proceeded to give the dead works in a certain parish so much of that £20,000, and the balance one made attributable to the live works or live mains, or what was sometimes called the semi-monopoly value. If one said, "Out of this £20,000 let £5,000 be for the dead works and "£15,000 for the live works," and if by exempting the machinery the £5,000 was reduced to £3,000, the only result would be to increase the £15,000 for live works to £17,000. For that reason the Departmental Committee was practically unable to get any railway company or big special property concern to urge that its machinery should be exempted. It would do them no good, and that was the reason why it was not exempted.

With regard to the valuation committees of county councils, he was sure it was right to rely on them to see that the new assessment areas behaved fairly within the county. In the past, one union had sometimes vied with another in avoiding the county rate as much as possible by seeing how low they could assess their union, and the only remedy of the County Rate Basis Committee was to raise the total of each parish, so that each parish as a whole should contribute fairly to the county rate. That, of course, did not allow the distribution of the county rate to be made in such a way that each hereditament in the parish contributed its fair share. Under the new Bill the poor rate valuation list was to be conclusive for the county rate, and the powers of the County Rate Basis Committee disappeared. Everyone, he thought, would welcome that. It would be in the interest of a county council in future to see that the poor law rate valuation lists were fair all over the county, and that was an improvement.

There was one other point he would like to mention. It was interesting to note that, as Mr. Konstam pointed out, solicitors might appear at Quarter Sessions in the case of any property the rateable value of which did not exceed £100. It was interesting also to note that it was the rateable value which must not exceed £100 and not the net annual value. As would be seen from the Paper, the rateable value of a farm was one-quarter of what it used to be, because it was the rateable value which would be brought down low instead of the rates in the pound, in order to confer the benefit of a three-quarters exemption on agricultural land. The provision with regard to solicitors, therefore, really meant that if the old rateable value, as it would have been termed, of a farm was £400, the new rateable value would be one-quarter of that, or £100, so that a solicitor obtained great privileges of audience in country districts. Those privileges, however, were much curtailed in urban districts, where rateable value and net annual value would generally be the same figure. He suggested that Parliament probably missed that point, and would have put net annual value instead of rateable value if they had not done so.

He would like to conclude by saying how delighted the members were to see present that evening Mr. Cross and Mr. Carson Roberts of the Ministry of Health. The Council of The Institution, as was well known, appointed a committee to go into the Rating Bill and do its best to promote any amendments thought necessary, and he would like to take the present opportunity of saying how very much they appreciated the way in which Mr. Cross and Mr. Carson Roberts listened to their representations. Where they found that on technical questions an amendment would be advisable in the general interests of the country, they gladly accepted it and recommended it to the Government. The Surveyors' Institution owed them a great debt of gratitude for the skill with which they guided the Bill to its present stage.

The Institution was also under a debt of gratitude to Major Ruggles-Brise, M.P., who was present that evening, and to Sir Philip Pilditch, M.P., who was abroad and unable to be present, for guiding the amendments proposed by the Council through the maze of the Committees and the other stages in the House of Commons.

He would like, in concluding, to express once more his thanks to Mr. Konstam for the very valuable Paper which the members had had the privilege of hearing that evening.

Mr. A. Body (Fellow) said it was both a pleasure and a privilege to support the vote of thanks to Mr. Konstam for his valuable Paper. Personally, when he had spoken in the hall of The Institution on previous occasions, it had been usually because some misguided client had thought fit to pay him a fee for so doing—generally, in his opinion, an inadequate fee. On the present occasion, however, he was bound to confess the boot was on the other leg; he thought he, and in fact all those who were present that evening, ought to pay a substantial fee to Mr. Konstam for the very great assistance he had given them.

He would like to take the present opportunity of telling Mr. Konstam how much the members of The Institution, and particularly those concerned with the rating side of a surveyor's activities, appreciated the publications on the Law of Rating which had been written by him from time to time. They were of the greatest possible use.

On the subject of the Rating and Valuation Act he was pleased to observe that although some alteration had been made in the definitions of "gross" and "rateable value," nevertheless the practical meaning of them, as understood for many years past, was still maintained. He thought surveyors ought to be grateful for that, as otherwise they might find themselves in the position which the lawyers were now in in having to wrestle with the Law of Property Act. The lawyers were having to start their education all over again in that respect, and surveyors ought to be glad that that task was not imposed on them.

Although the definitions in question were, as he had said, maintained as to their practical meaning, he was bound to say they had been made much clearer. In times past many a lawyer, and indeed many a surveyor not intimately acquainted with the practical application of those definitions, had come to grief in trying to wrestle with them. To that extent the improvement was gratifying.

Mr. Konstam raised rather an interesting question, on which perhaps he might give a little further information, by suggesting that it was immaterial whether a valuer arrived at gross or rateable first. Personally as he read the Act the particulars to be inserted in the valuation list would be such as might be prescribed by the Minister, and it might well be that, in view of the statutory deductions from gross provided in Part I. of Schedule II. of the Act, the Minister would prescribe that the gross in respect of all those properties should be inserted in the list. That would be the gross in respect of houses and land; but so far as other properties were concerned, he was hoping the Minister would see fit to prescribe that the gross should not be inserted. Assuming, however, that the gross were inserted in respect of the properties in Part I. of Schedule II., he did not understand why it was immaterial whether the valuer arrived at gross or rateable first. The scale would apply to such properties as hotels, theatres, and buildings of that type. The value of an hotel, however, was governed very largely by its earning capacity, and its earning capacity was often deduced from the accounts. It was a common experience to find that the cost of maintaining an hotel was much in excess of the statutory allowance of practically one-sixth, and if the gross was first calculated one would, of course, omit from that calculation all the charges in the accounts in respect of maintenance. If the rateable was first calculated, on the other hand, all those charges would be brought into account, and it seemed to him that in a case such as he had referred to where the annual cost of maintenance exceeded the statutory allowance of one-sixth—and in the case of hotels it often would—if the rateable was calculated first, one would get a very much lower figure than if the gross were first taken and the statutory deduction made. If Mr. Konstam could give a little further explanation on that point and say what he had in mind when referring to the question in that way it would be very valuable. Perhaps he would also say whether he thought a valuer could elect which value he would find first.

He thought it was right to say that in general the Act was a great improvement upon the law of rating as it previously stood. It certainly, if faithfully and properly administered by the local authorities, gave them improved machinery, and should result in much better uniformity being obtained and in a number of anomalies that now existed being diminished. In his opinion, however, the weakest point in the Act was the provision made for appeals. The provisions in that regard were very important, because in the working of the Act everything was governed by the final Court of Appeal, and all the rating authorities must be influenced by the results they would obtain from the Court of Appeal. Mr. Konstam had mentioned a startling case of the conflict in decisions of courts of Quarter Sessions—even courts of Quarter Sessions in the same county. That was not a unique instance. Personally he could give several like it, and he had no doubt that many gentlemen present could do the same. That sort of thing was bound to occur until there was a court which could lay down uniform principles applicable throughout the country.

In his view it was not possible to carry through that procedure by means of courts of Quarter Sessions. He thought the best tribunal for attaining that end would be a tribunal similar to that suggested by the Departmental Committee on Local Taxation in 1913 or 1914, a tribunal of rating experts, presided over by a barrister with experience in rating practice.

There would be another advantage in such a court. The expense of appealing to Quarter Sessions at the present time was absolutely prohibitive in comparatively small cases. A court such as he suggested, on the other hand, would, of course, be open to anyone: even a surveyor should have the right of audience, and a technical court of that description would, in course of time, shorten the procedure very much. They would establish recognised rules of practice, and it would be a simple matter for the ordinary surveyor, accountant or ratepayer to appear before them and conduct his case.

Mr. Konstam and Mr. Eve had both referred to the privilege of appearing by a solicitor at Quarter Sessions. What would probably happen, however, would be that the ordinary country practitioner, with little or no experience in rating, would find himself matched against a plus one counsel like Mr. Konstam, and he thought, therefore, the privilege of appearing by a solicitor would be of very doubtful value to the ratepayer.

With regard to the question of arbitration, he would like to point out that, so far as appeals were concerned, he might be told, in answer to what he had previously said, that recourse could be had to arbitration; but in that connection it should be borne in mind that the arbitration was arbitration by consent of both parties. He thought the effect of that in many cases would be that the assessment committee, righteously indignant at the appeal entered, would refuse arbitration, and leave the unfortunate ratepayer to his remedy at Quarter Sessions, knowing that the cost of that would prove a sufficient deterrent. That was an unfair weapon to put in the hands of the assessment committee.

Mr. W. Harold Eve (Member of Council) said it gave him great pleasure to support the vote of thanks which had been moved to Mr. Konstam. He was glad that Mr. Konstam had referred to the reading of the Paper as a pleasant task; personally he had been very much interested in hearing it.

The upheaval which had been suggested would take place by many of those who were opposing the Rating and Valuation Bill would not, he thought, be realised. As Mr. Konstam had said, the definitions of value were practically the same as were in force at present. He was sorry, however, that the recommendations of the Council as to the abandonment of gross had not been accepted entirely by those who were responsible for the Act. He had a personal interest in that matter, because he remembered that his father, at a time when Mr. Goschen was Chancellor of the Exchequer—a considerable time ago—pressed for the abandonment of gross and estimated rental, but unsuccessfully.

Mr. Konstam said that the scale of deduction, which, of course, was a very convenient thing for assessment committees, might cause hardship in cases where the hereditament was one where the repairs were exceptionally high. He had always thought that when there was a maximum scale laid down in an Act, it was open to the valuer, in fixing the gross, when there was no rent, to take that fact into consideration. He was limited to the amount which he had to deduct, and he would arrive at the gross bearing that in mind. After all, the rateable value was the important figure.

He had been rather surprised to see in the Act a provision that the valuer to the assessment committee might not remain with the committee while it was considering its decision. He could quite see that if the valuer was retained by the rating authority, it was right that he should retire when the committee, who were the judges in the first instance, were considering the objection; but what would probably be the case was that on an appeal the valuer to the assessment committee would give evidence on the committee's behalf, and it would seem right, therefore, that he should be in the room to help the committee on any question in regard to which they wanted his opinion. He thought that that was a provision which might work rather unequally so far as the assessment committees were concerned.

He was glad to see in the provisions for the places of hearing that the hearings were to take place " at some con- " venient place." For a good many years he had to sit with an assessment committee whose place of hearing was a very nice hotel about three miles from the nearest station, and about as inconvenient a place for getting to as one could imagine. He did not know whether any better accommodation would be given for those who attended to support objections. Many times he was comfortably seated in one of those marble halls frequently used by the committees, and indignant protests were made by surveyors who had been kept waiting in some draughty passage, and who protested vehemently at the want of consideration and accommodation for them. At other times they were crowded into a small room where half the people had been smoking for an hour beforehand. Altogether, the provision for them was frequently very inferior.

Mr. A. Carson Roberts (Visitor) (Ministry of Health) said that, after listening for a good many days to the scheme of the Bill being criticised in Standing Committee in the House on Report Stage, and in another place, it was very refreshing to him to hear the appreciative remarks which Mr. Konstam had been good enough to make about it, and the kindly and gentle criticisms which he had made on those parts of it which he thought were susceptible of improvement. It seemed indeed ungracious to approach any of his criticisms after the kindly treatment he had given to the efforts of those responsible for the Act, but there were just one or two points which called for remark.

The first point which occurred to him was in connection with the provision in the definition of gross value which concerned flat and tenement property. Mr. Konstam said that that might be found to afford " some " compensation to owners of blocks of flats and offices, in place of the provision in the Third Schedule of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, which gave them special treatment in regard to the calculation of the maintenance deduction. Personally he thought Mr. Konstam might have gone a little further. He thought it was a fact that if, in arriving at the gross value, the value of any service rendered by the landlord, or of anything other than the hereditament itself, was excluded, it then became a question of whether the allowance for maintenance ought to be greater in the case of a flat than in the case of an ordinary house. Personally he would not be so presumptuous as to offer an opinion before a meeting of surveyors, but, unless they told him otherwise, he would have thought the answer was clearly in the negative. If the gross were really brought down to a value which was only the value of the hereditament taken, including, of course, a share of the value of any part of the building which was enjoyed in common with other tenants, that amounted to bringing it down to a case comparable to a house, and then, if the scale allowance was equally applicable, the whole of any possible grievance was removed. He would very much like to hear the opinion of any surveyors on the question of whether there ought to be a different allowance for flat property when that safeguard had been afforded.

Another point, to which Mr. Gerald Eve had referred, and in regard to which he felt very much inclined to agree with him, was the question of what Mr. Konstam referred to as the "crowning mercy" of the Act, which he also thought was one of its best points—the reduction in the number of cases in which gross value had to be entered. He thought the Act there had gone as far as it well could in the exclusion of gross value. He hesitated to express any opinion on the doubtful point of whether mines were excluded or not, though it would be difficult to suggest any heading in Part I. of the Schedule which included them, but all industrial and public utility properties were excluded. Gross value was only required in the case of ordinary buildings and land, and, seeing that in the case of the great majority of those the rent that was paid was an index of gross value, and as one would have to seek elsewhere for an index of net value, he thought it was reasonable to begin with gross value in deducing net. Further, when one considered the theory on which maintenance deductions were founded, and looked into the question inquired into by the Dunedin Committee, one might well ask whether there was any justification, in dealing with the contribution of a tenant whose landlord maintained the property, to take into account the varying amount of the burden which fell on the landlord. He felt it could hardly be held that that had any true connection with the amount which the tenant should contribute to local taxation. He thought there was real truth in what the Dunedin Committee reported—that the two things had no relation to each other. If that were so, it was surely a fact that what had been allowed throughout the past was in reality simply a customary abatement, which had the effect only of varying the incidence of the charge as between the different classes of property concerned, one class getting a rather higher deduction of that nature than another. He thought that perhaps when the Act came into operation it would be found that the idea of relating that allowance to maintenance would altogether drop out in the course of time.

In conclusion, he desired to thank Mr. Konstam for his kind references to the efforts which those responsible for the Act had been able to make.

Mr. Graham Mould (Associate) said he was very glad to have the privilege of paying a tribute of appreciation to his learned friend Mr. Konstam for the admirable Paper he had presented. It was a great treat to all those present to listen to such a Paper read by one who was a past and present master of the law and the art of rating.

There were only two or three matters to which he desired to refer. Mr. Konstam, probably through a desire to keep his Paper as brief as possible, had not dealt with one or two questions at any length. He had put in a postscript at the end of the Paper, references which in themselves were quite interesting to several matters contained in the Act. One of those references related to the position with regard to the compounding of rates; at least, he believed that was what the reference was intended to connote. He would like to point out in that connection that by Section 11 of the Act the matter of compounding of rates was dealt with in detail, and it was dealt with in a matter which one always found in an Act of Parliament nowadays; the owner of the property was placed in a less enviable position than that he previously occupied. Whereas under the old compounding provisions, if he remembered rightly, the owner who remained properly obdurate up to a certain point could get as much as 25 or even, he believed, 30 per cent. discount, now, however well mannered he might be, he could not get more than 15 per cent. That was a point to the debit of a property-owner. All the allowances were to be reduced, and he thought the gross amount a property-owner could possibly get was 15 per cent. in place of the old 25 or 30 per cent.

Another matter to which he would like to draw attention was that the new Act took, as it were, a leaf out of the Law of Distress Act. By Section 15, where the rates were in arrear, the rating authority could serve upon any person paying rent a notice stating the amount of the arrears of rates, and requiring future payments of rent to be made to that authority to operate in part payment of the rates.

With regard to the question of machinery, that was far too big a matter to touch on in the course of a few minutes, but so far as the Act made any alteration or modification in the assessment of machinery or the extent to which it might be taken into account—to use the old phrase—in the rating of any hereditament, it was all to the good. It did not necessarily ensure uniformity, but it did, he thought, take a step in the direction of uniformity. He had been rather struck a short time ago to hear an eminent rating man point out that in a neighbourhood which he knew there was a stream which divided the locality and formed the boundary of two rating authorities, one being on each side of the stream. Machinery of a certain class was taken into account in rating the premises on one side of the stream, while on the other side precisely similar machinery used for exactly the same purposes was disregarded, and the stream was only 7 feet wide. No one could support an anomaly of that character, and so far as the Act under consideration made any alteration in that regard it was an advantage.

There were one or two observations made by Mr. Gerald Eve about which he would like to say a word. He could not quite understand why, if one had two houses side by side, similar in accommodation and in position, and one of them was substantially built in the sense that it was constructed of brick with a slate roof while the other was thatched, there should not be a difference in the deduction for upkeep. It seemed to him that logically where there was what might be called a thatched structure on the one hand as opposed to a brick structure on the other, there was a difference in the cost of repairs, and anything which omitted to take that difference into account was a disadvantage and not an advantage. If he was right in thinking that the basic principle of rating was the value of the occupation to the occupier (there might be certain things above it on the one hand or below it on the other, but one always came back to that basic principle), then it seemed to him those two premises had not in fact the same occupational value.

Mr. Eve also suggested that surveyors should arrive at a post-war mind for valuation as opposed to a pre-war standard. Theoretically he entirely agreed that logically there was nothing to be said against valuing premises as they were to-day, but from a practical point of view, so far as pre-war standards of value could be preserved, he respectfully suggested they should be preserved, for one reason and for one reason alone. Pre-war standards were low standards; post-war standards were high standards. It might not be logical, but it was human nature that, if one had a high valuation, that made for extravagance, while a low valuation made for economy. He did not think that that fact could be too effectively stressed. It was all very well to say that a 5*s.* rate on an assessment of £100 produced only the same amount as a 10*s.* rate on an assessment of £50, but it was far more likely that economy would be obtained with a 10*s.*

rate on £50 than with a 5*s.* rate on £100, human nature being what it was.

Mr. Body dealt with the question of the weakness of appeals. He was not so sure, personally, that the Act really was very weak in its provision as to appeals. First of all there was the assessment committee, whose hearts, although difficult to reach, could occasionally be touched. Then there were the Quarter Sessions, and from Quarter Sessions one could go on, with a case specially stated on any point of law, to the High Court, and, of course, the decisions on the High Court would tend to make for uniformity.

Mr. Harold Eve dealt with the question of the valuer to the assessment committee remaining in the room. Personally it seemed to him it was an objectionable practice that the adviser of one of the two parties to any litigation should remain in the room while the judges were considering their decision. It was not a question of whether the advice tendered was good or bad or whether the opportunity would or would not be taken advantage of. The fact was it was undesirable. It was very much better, having heard the evidence, for those who were to decide the question to decide it on what they had heard and be unfettered by any subsequent recommendations. As had been said by one of the most eminent judges, it was not merely desirable that justice should be done, but that in all cases it should appear that justice had been done.

Mr. H. Stewart Logsdon (Professional Associate) (Special Rating Diploma) said his only reason for speaking that evening was that he was deeply interested in the subject under discussion, and because he knew it was the policy of the Council of The Institution to encourage junior members to speak. As chairman of the Junior Meetings he would like, on behalf of the junior members, to thank the Council for that encouragement, and he also wished to thank them personally for being allowed to take part in the discussion that evening.

Many of the points to which he had wished to refer had been touched on by previous speakers. He would like to say at the outset that, broadly speaking, as a rating surveyor, he was in agreement with the provisions of the Act. He thought when the time arrived, and the provisions of the Act were tested under the ordinary procedure of rating, it would be found that the claim made for the Act in its preamble, namely, that it was an Act to simplify and amend the law in respect of the making and collection of rates and to promote uniformity in the valuation of property for rating purposes, would be achieved.

Personally he thought the most serious effect the Act would have in the immediate future would be the transference of the burden of the payment of rates from one class of ratepayer to another. He thought, particularly in an area such as Sheffield, a great industrial area in which machinery and plant had hitherto been taken fully into account in rating, that would be felt. With the limitation in rating of that machinery, the burden of the rates—if the same amount of rates had to raised—would inevitably fall more on the shoulders of the householders and owners of business premises, and he thought it would be found that the alteration of the rating areas and the areas for raising rates would in itself tend very materially to affect the amount of the rate in the pound to which people had hitherto been accustomed.

It had been his privilege four years ago to read a Paper on the question of rating before the Junior Meetings, and in that Paper he dealt with proposals for improving the law and practice of rating. He found that he advocated reforms in respect of eleven points in that Paper, namely, the consolidation of the Rating Acts, the enlargement of rating areas, the establishment of a cheaper tribunal than Quarter Sessions, the abolition of Special Sessions, periodic and preferably quinquennial re-valuation, with adequate provision for revision during the quinquennium, the abolition of gross value for some properties, uniform deductions from gross to rateable in other cases, the objector to state the correction he desired when objecting to his assessment, the extension of exemption to hospitals and charitable institutions, one value for rates and taxes, and special provision for rating of railways and machinery.

The first eight of those eleven items were dealt with by the new Act practically on the lines suggested in the Paper; two had not been dealt with; and one—referring to the rating of railways—had been postponed until the introduction of a further Act in the near future.

He had intended to touch on the question raised by Mr. Eve as to the rating of premises containing machinery belonging to one class of person and to those belonging to a railway company—such as engineering workshops. Mr. Eve thought that strictly there would be no difficulty in valuing those two factories on a different basis, i.e., taking machinery into account in the case of a railway engineering shop, but not doing so in the case of a shop belonging to a private individual. He agreed with Mr. Eve entirely that in the result, the former having to be deducted from the total rateable value ascertained from the accounts of the railway company, the difference was practically immaterial, but there would remain the anomaly on apportionment of the two similar factories perhaps almost adjoining each other, one belonging to one class of occupier and one to another, rated on entirely different principles; and it would hit the railway company harder than might be imagined where a railway shop which would probably be situated in an industrial area was valued with machinery and therefore at a higher value than another factory in private occupation. The railway company would have to pay a higher proportion of their rates in the area where the rates in the £ were high.

The owner of property had been taken into consideration more than under previous Acts. He had more rights to be served with notices affecting his property than previously. He regretted that under the present Act, however, the Rating Act of 1874 and the Advertising Stations Rating Act of 1889 had not been abolished. There was a different principle laid down in both those Acts for the assessment of different classes of property, and one would have thought this would have been a good opportunity to bring all classes of property under the same method of assessment.

There was one question he would like to ask Mr. Konstam. There was a different time specified in Section 2 (1) for the operation of the Act to that specified in Section 2 (2). In the case of Section 2 (1) a general rate in an urban rating area was to be levied as from the date of the first new valuation list, but by Section 2 (2) a general rate in a rural rating area was to be levied as from the appointed day, the 1st April, 1927. He did not quite appreciate the reason for the difference between those two dates, and thought Mr. Konstam might be able to give valuable information in that respect.

In conclusion he wished to add his thanks to those of other speakers to Mr. Konstam for his valuable Paper, and for the interesting discussion it engendered.

Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve (Barrister-at-Law) (Visitor) said it was very kind of The Institution to invite him to be present that evening, and he was particularly grateful that he should have been invited on an occasion when Mr. Konstam was to read a Paper, because it was from Mr. Konstam that he had learned what little he knew about rating, and he was sure that in the future it would be from Mr. Konstam, through Papers such as the present one, and from the new book that he had got ready in so surprisingly short a time, that he would learn what he was going to know about the new Act.

First of all he would like to mention a point which he thought would at any rate be of importance to everyone dealing with the Act for the next two or three years, namely, what amendments in the law and procedure of rating were made by the new Act which would come into force before the new valuation list, or, in other words, between the present time and 1st April, 1928 or 1929. It was well known that many things had to happen after that date, but it might be interesting to know what was going to happen before that date.

Before the appointed day, which was April, 1927, he thought he was right in saying that no change took place at all in the machinery or practice of rating, but there was one very important section which applied before that date, and that was Section 65. Section 65 gave power to rating authorities now and assessment committees directly they were appointed, which ought to be fairly soon, to act and to use all the powers that they had with the exception of those powers which were directly transferred to them from some other bodies on the appointed day. One of the most important functions of a rating authority, of course, would be the making and preparation of the first new list, and one of the most important functions of the new assessment committees would be the correction and the revision and looking over of the various lists under their jurisdiction submitted to them by the rating authorities. Those powers the rating authorities and assessment committees, under Section 65 of the Act, could exercise before the appointed day.

They had full powers under Section 55 to appoint rating officers and valuation officers. Under Section 38 they had power to appoint competent persons to advise them in valuations. Those powers they had at present. He respectfully suggested that in view of the magnitude of the task before them of valuing the whole of England and Wales between the present time and, at any rate, the 1st April, 1929, it would be wise for them to take advantage of those provisions and employ those "competent persons," as they were called in the Act, who, after all, were not unlimited in numbers and had but a very short time before them. It would be better to do that now than wait until the appointed day.

Between the appointed day and the coming into force of the valuation list various changes would take place. He thought it would be comforting to most people who had to deal with the Act to know that they were not of great importance, and it would not be until the machinery of the new valuation list really got going that important modifications would have to be thought of. Overseers went and assessment committees went. The rating authorities were to make all rates, but the rates were practically the same as before. In the case of country and rural districts the new general rate would come into force in April, 1927; in the case of urban areas it would not come into force until the valuation list was passed. He did not know the reason for that distinction. That made a very slight difference for the year 1927, and it was important to remember in connection with the Act that one would have to deal differently with rural areas than with urban areas after April, 1927. The main changes were as follow: In both rural and urban areas after next April the rates would not have to be allowed by justices, but simply made by the rating authority and then published by prescribed notices. The rating authority would have wider powers of amendment given them by the Act, and in particular of adding omissions or amending misdescriptions—a very important power. The rate would be able to be made retrospectively for past expenditure, and, finally, a defaulting ratepayer could have his rates recovered through his tenant's or lodger's rents.

There were three additional matters with which rural areas were concerned before the coming into force of the valuation list: By a resolution of the rating authority a ratepayer might get a discount up to 2½ per cent. for prompt payment of his rates; a ratepayer could no longer go to prison on a summons for distress warrant if he satisfied the magistrates he was poor; and a rural ratepayer would be entitled earlier than an urban ratepayer to get fuller particulars on his demand note for rates.

The machinery for the new valuation list commenced by the rating authority sending out to every ratepayer a questionnaire. Until that questionnaire arrived—it should be somewhere about the autumn of 1927—it might be some comfort to ratepayers and their advisers to know that those very few modifications he had mentioned were the only changes that would take place in the law or practice of rating.

Sir Harry Courthope-Munroe, K.C. (Associate of Council), said he had not intended to trespass on the time of the meeting, but would like, if he might, to break a friendly lance with Mr. Body. Mr. Body said that in his view the weakest point in the Act lay in the appeals to Quarter Sessions. Personally, however, he could not help thinking the Government had solved a difficult problem in a very just and excellent manner. There would be, as he understood it, a perambulatory tribunal which would go into the various parts of a county to hear appeals, and, for his part, he saw no reason why the costs in most cases should be any more than the costs of county court proceedings. He could not help thinking there was something behind Mr. Body's grievance, because after referring to the right of audience given to solicitors, and describing his learned friend Mr. Konstam as a plus one counsel (with which description he cordially agreed), Mr. Body said, "Heaven help the local "solicitor!" and ended by saying the surveyor ought to have had a right of audience.

Mr. G. V. Nye (Special Rating Diploma) (Professional Associate) said he believed Mr. Gerald Eve said the machinery which was to be scheduled was the machinery which was not to be taken into account. His own interpretation of the Third Schedule was that it was a schedule of machinery which was to be taken into account.

Mr. Gerald Eve said that was so.

Mr. Nye, continuing, and dealing with the question of objectors and the adviser to the assessment committee retiring from the committee-room, said he knew of a committee who allowed the objector and adviser to stop in the room. He saw no objection to that procedure, which he thought was rather a happy one.

There was one question which he would like to put to Mr. Konstam. In March, 1927, forms might be sent out to occupiers asking them for certain information. He supposed that if assessment committees were formed before March, 1927, they might require those returns to be issued before March, 1927. That point was rather interesting as there was a certain area which was conducting a revalution now, and that area would come under the new Act. If information could be got before next year, it would certainly be helpful.

Mr. J. E. Secker (Fellow) said as an infrequent attender at meetings of The Institution there were a few words he would like to say. He was one of those who believed the Act from the very first was going to be a distinct and a great improvement. He believed it would add much more to the regularity of assessments and their uniformity. He believed the system of appeals was better than before, though not the best possible. The present system of appeals was to his mind absolutely bad. The last appeal he attended before the Quarter Sessions lasted a day. There were sixteen magistrates on the bench. Five of them came in late, three of them went to sleep throughout the performance, and at the end they upheld the assessment. The new system of appeals to Quarter Sessions did limit the number of magistrates, and apparently those magistrates who would sit were to be a definite body whose duty it would be to attend regularly.

There was one other matter to which he wished to refer. A questionnaire was to be submitted. He hoped the Council of The Surveyors' Institution would see to it that they had a voice in the preparation of that questionnaire, or that they watched things very carefully when those questionnaires were first issued, and did their level best to protect the owner of property from irregular and inquisitive questions. Personally he thought that assessment committees and rating authorities could look after themselves, but he hoped The Surveyors' Institution would look after the interests of the ratepayer.

If he might refer to another point, Mr. Gerald Eve said it was necessary to forget the shibboleths of the past. Personally he appealed to surveyors to support that strongly and to see if they could not forget some of the shibboleths of the past. He personally dealt with a special form of property, namely, licensed property, and he would ask the surveyors of The Institution to see whether they could not forget the systems that had been adopted in the past, and apply a new system altogether, so as to secure uniformity, and to insure that the whole question of the assessment of licensed premises throughout England was dealt with on a much more uniform and regular basis.

Mr. E. M. Konstam, in reply, said that before answering in detail some of the questions which had been put to him he wished to say how very much he appreciated the far too kind things which had been said about himself and his Paper by the mover and seconder of the motion and by other speakers. He felt he little deserved them, but he was extremely happy to have been able, at any rate, to read a Paper on a subject of so much interest and to stimulate so many interesting speeches. He would also like to say what a pleasure it had been to him to hear the sons of two old friends of his take part in the discussion. He referred to Mr. H. S. Logsdon and Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve, both of whom had contributed most interestingly to the discussion, and with the fathers of both of whom he had had long and pleasant associations. The father of one of them, Mr. C. J. Logsdon, he was glad to see present that evening.

If he might take the speakers in their inverse order, Mr. Secker referred to a sad experience he had had at Quarter Sessions where there were sixteen magistrates. Personally he did not remember ever arguing an appeal where there were more than sixty! Possibly the fact that the way in which they had decided was not the way he wished them to decide was one of the reasons why that incident had rather burned itself into his memory, but of the five or six magistrates who did listen on that occasion he thought the majority were with him. The other fifty-four, however, were against him! He was, therefore, very much in sympathy with Mr. Secker on that point, and indeed on the other point with regard to licensed property. If surveyors could now, with the new start they were being given, devise a formula for licensed property which would ultimately be held to be a formula not merely of law but of fact, like the one which had recently been applied to water by the House of Lords, they would have rendered a great service to the country; but whether a formula which applied to water would apply also to licensed property was a question which, he suggested, the House of Lords alone could solve.

One or two points were raised on the question of returns, and the suggestion was made that under Section 65 returns might be called for before the appointed day. That was probably correct. The rating authority need not wait for any particular date before calling for returns, but, as doubtless the Minister of Health would prescribe forms of return in the course of the present year, it would, whether it was competent or not, be extremely inconvenient from an administrative point of view if rating authorities or assessment committees were to devise their own form of return. Obviously uniformity in that matter, as in others, was an ideal to be striven for, and there seemed to be no reason why, as the Minister of Health had definite powers of prescribing forms, those forms should not be awaited before action was taken.

On another matter he was told he had made an error in interpretation. Towards the close of his Paper he said: "The first new valuatian lists under the Act are to come "into force on the 1st April or 1st October, 1928 or 1929." He understood now that, in the view of the Ministry, the proviso (a) to Section 19 (1) was not considered to apply to the first new valuation list but only to the second, and therefore the first new valuation list must come into force on the 1st April, 1928 or 1929, and not on the 1st October of either of those years, though as to the second list the Minister might vary the date. Whether he was right or wrong in the interpretation he gave in the Paper was perfectly immaterial, because the Minister was the person who was going to prescribe, and it was not to be allowed to the assessment committee to make its own law or to interpret the law for itself on that matter. Where the bowler was himself the umpire, it did not matter whether the batsman thought he was out or not! For practical purposes, therefore, it could be taken that what he had said in the Paper was wrong, and that the first new valuation list would have to come into force on the 1st April, 1928 or 1929, or the Minister of Health would want to know the reason why.

On the question of machinery, he thought all the speakers were more or less agreed, except that Mr. Gerald Eve took exception to what was said in the Paper about the Shortt Committee having recommended a catalogue. He thought the difference between himself and Mr. Gerald Eve was only one of nomenclature. The Shortt Committee recommended a short catalogue, while the Act provided a long one; but really there was not any difference in principle. Both the Shortt Committee and the Act were for specifying actual kinds of machinery that were to be rated, and did not want a test to be provided which would require separate application in each case. Whether it was more practical to describe the classes that were to be rated in broad terms or to describe them more specifically, he thought time alone could show, because, of course, no catalogue could be so detailed as to prevent the headings being really headings of classes. The longer the catalogue the smaller the class which was described by the heading; that was all.

He thought the subject of "gross value" covered most of the other important points that had been dealt with by the various speakers. He was wholly in agreement with the conclusion that Section 31 (4) and other sections of the Act had probably done away with the power to "accept the "gross"—that manœuvre which most people had employed at one time and writhed under at another, but which certainly no one in his unimpassioned moments could desire to perpetuate. Between appeals, most people would recognise that it was a position which ought not to be allowed to go on, and, as he had said, he thought it had been mercifully done away with.

That led him to the question of the scale of statutable deductions. He understood from his friend Mr. Carson Roberts, when on one occasion they had talked the matter over privately, that Mr. Roberts rather disagreed with him about the proviso to the definition of gross value having produced any counterpoise to the flats being deprived of the advantage which the metropolitan schedule gave them. He was not quite sure Mr. Carson Roberts agreed with him now about it, because in his own opinion the flat-owners were entitled, in fact, to an extra allowance for the heavy cost of repairs they had to suffer with regard to the maintenance of the roofs, common staircases, and so on, and also with regard to the heavy extra costs of repairs and maintenance which the flats themselves gave rise to. Whether that extra allowance was brought about by the proviso or not was one of those questions which would probably have to be debated at some time or other in the courts, but that the flat-owners ought not to be deprived of it was a question on which he for one had come to a definite opinion.

Mr. Carson Roberts also spoke of all "ordinary build-" ings" having to have a gross value calculated and statutable deductions made according to scale. That, of course, was true, but the scale undoubtedly did apply to more buildings than were usually called "ordinary buildings." Hotels, theatres and cinemas scarcely came within the category of ordinary buildings, and, as was well known in most of those cases, it was extremely difficult to arrive at a net annual value merely on a comparison of rents. One was accustomed to get at it on a basis of profit, so that in most cases there was no actual rent either paid for the hereditament or available for purposes of comparison. Whether it was a good thing that there should be a scale for those premises or not, and whether it was a good thing that it should be necessary to arrive at a gross for those premises, were questions which he could not help thinking were in doubt as matters of policy.

That brought him to the point about calculating the gross or the rateable first. He had not meant to suggest, by what he said in the Paper, that it was allowable to get at a true statutable deduction and add that to the rateable and then deduct merely the scale deduction. That had often been done in the metropolis by a practice which seemed to him singularly illogical and totally divorced from the real facts as to value. It was well known in the metropolis that one often took a rent fixed by a repairing lease, added 10 per cent. for the estimated repairs, and then deducted the scale deductions, which yielded a result perfectly ridiculous except as a mere convention. He felt that that that was not what ought to be allowed under the new Act. What he had meant was that if one arrived at a rateable, as one ought in practice to do, in those exceptional cases, by making the calculation on the basis of profits, one might add the appropriate percentage according to the scale to get at the gross, the appropriate percentage, of course, being the converse fraction to that which was deducted from the gross to get to the rateable. One-quarter off was one-third on. He did not mean to go beyond that in saying what he did about arriving at the gross or the rateable first.

The other questions on the scale of deductions were questions on which there had been a number of very interesting observations by gentlemen of great experience in making valuations, and he did not think there was anything he could add to what had been said in that respect.

There remained Mr. Body's remark about the appeal tribunal. Personally he thought there was a great deal to be said for a central tribunal, but he supposed the feeling in the counties that the local county tribunals ought not to lose their powers was too strong. There was one great advantage which he saw in a local tribunal. One might go on with an appeal arising in the west of England without having Mr. Body on one's side, and might have the courage to fight that appeal before a tribunal which sat in London, although it was well known it was extremely difficult—if one had not that good fortune—to go to victory anywhere west of Waterloo Station.

One other question had been put to him, though he did not know that he was the person to give an answer to it, and that was whether he could say what was the reason why the general rate in urban areas only took place from the date of the first new valuation, while the general rate in rural areas came in from the appointed day? There were one or two reasons which occurred to him for that, chiefly that in regard to urban areas there had to be a consolidation of various rates, it might be under different enactments. Under the Second Part of the Second Schedule, for the purpose of that consolidation, the exemptions which now existed for the general district rate, and possibly other rates under local Acts, had to be watered down by the "non-exemption" which now applied to the borough rate, and that had to be done under a scheme which was to be made under Part III. of the Second Schedule. Until those schemes were made, the valuation list could not be made so as to give effect to the modified exemptions, and therefore the consolidated rate could not be made in accordance with the valuation list. That, he thought, was one of the explanations. There might be others, but that in itself would be a sufficient reason.

He hoped if he had omitted to answer any questions he would be forgiven. He ended as he began, by saying again what a great pleasure it had been to address his audience and to hear the interesting speeches to which the subject had given rise.

The vote of thanks was then put to the meeting by the PRESIDENT and carried unanimously, and the proceedings terminated.

Paper No. 498.

THE NEW LAW OF PROPERTY.

By C. P. Sanger.

For discussion at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th March, and Monday, 12th April, 1926.

Shortly the effect of the new legislation is that, with unimportant exceptions, all land in this country is held in common socage. A legal estate must be perpetual or for a definite period; it cannot be vested in an infant, nor can there be a legal estate in an undivided share. Thus each parcel of land, which, however, may be divided horizontally from another parcel, is vested in law in either one person or in two or more persons as joint tenants.

The chief ways in which the owner or owners of the legal estate can deal with the land are roughly as follows :—

Case A.—There is one person who has the legal estate, and the beneficial interest. He can deal with the land in all the ways permitted by law; he can convey it either on sale or voluntarily, exchange it, grant leases (except reversionary leases not to take effect for 21 years), mortgage it, grant easements over it, accept surrenders of leases, and so on.

Case B.—There is one person who has the legal estate, but the land is settled land. In that case he has the powers given to a tenant for life by the Settled Land Act, 1925. He can sell or exchange. He can grant leases for 50 years, mining leases for 100 years, building and forestry leases for 999 years, and may accept surrenders of leases. He can grant easements for valuable consideration, and can mortgage the land for certain purposes. He has also certain powers of granting parts of the land for public or charitable purposes, of dedicating land for streets, open spaces, &c., and providing land for small dwellings, small holdings, and dwellings for working classes. But he may not receive any capital money; that has to be paid to two trustees, or into court, or to the public trustee, or to a trust corporation. So that he can deal with the land almost as effectually as an absolute owner, except as regards mortgaging.

Case C.—The land may be settled, and yet there may be no individual who has the powers of a tenant for life. In that case the land is vested in the trustees of the settlement who have all the powers of a tenant for life.

Case D.—The land may be vested in a personal representative or personal representatives. He or they can then sell or mortgage before an assent has been given to the devise of the land under the will. On an intestacy the personal representatives hold in trust for sale and have all the powers of trustees for sale.

Case E.—If the land is not settled and is vested in two or more persons jointly they are trustees for sale, and have all the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925.

Case F.—If the land is vested in trustees for charitable or public trusts, the trustees have all the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925, subject to obtaining any necessary consent from the Charity Commissioners or the Board of Education.

Case G.—If the land is vested in a university or college to which the University and College Estates Act, 1925, applies, the powers are on the whole similar to those of a tenant for life, except that the consent of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries is requisite and the leasing powers are more limited.

Case H.—The title is registered under the Land Registration Act, 1925. In that case, subject to any restrictions, inhibitions or other entries on the register, the registered proprietor or proprietors have, roughly speaking, the powers of an absolute owner except, apparently, a power to accept surrenders of leases.

A mortgagee never has the fee simple. A legal mortgagee has either a term of years or a legal charge. The legal mortgagor, until the mortgagee has taken possession or appointed a receiver, has certain powers of leasing and accepting surrenders of leases without the mortgagee's consent; and the mortgagee, after he has taken possession or appointed a receiver, has similar powers without the mortgagor's consent. The mortgagee can sell and, on a sale, can convey the fee simple.

The general result is that when the new system has become familiar, there will not be any serious difficulties in dealing with land. Most of what I have said also will apply to the person in whom leasehold terms or perpetual rent-charges are vested. Just as in the case of stocks and shares, a purchaser or mortgagee will not be troubled with infancy, undivided shares or beneficial interests. He will always have a legal owner or legal owners of the whole to deal with.

The short experience we have had of the new system has, however, revealed some difficulties. I will mention two. The first is this: The Settled Land Act, 1925, says that land subject to a family charge, such as a jointure, is settled land. Many persons who have bought a plot of land forming part of a large family estate have been content to take an indemnity against the jointure. The difficulty is that now on a sale the purchase money would have to be paid to trustees, and the vendor would have no right to receive it until the jointress dies or releases. The other difficulty is this: Under the law before 1926 anyone who acquired land with notice of a restrictive covenant was bound by that covenant. But this has been changed. Restrictive covenants imposed since 1925 have to be registered and do not bind the land until registered. If A sells a plot of land to B, who enters into restrictive covenants with A, and then immediately afterwards mortgages to C, A will not have had time to register, and C will apparently be free of the restrictions. This can be got over by imposing restrictions on the estate and registering them before the estate is sold in lots.

I believe that the new system will work well. It will be necessary to legislate to remove a few difficulties and to make a few points clear, but I have already had personally several cases where a complicated title has been greatly simplified, and a very large part of the new law consists of improvements which were generally desired.

PAPER 499.

THE LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1925.

By Frank Hunt, C.V.O. (Member of Council).

For discussion at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th March, and Monday, 12th April, 1926.

The first day of January last saw a momentous change in the statutory law of property. This was effected by Parliament in a series of statutes which, for the sake of convenience, may be referred to as the Law of Property Acts, 1925, and the avowed intention of Parliament in passing this new law was to secure such simplification in the law of property as to assimilate it so far as practicable to the transfer of chattels. The time that will be needed to consummate this desirable end has not been quantified, but I think it is apparent that, at any rate until all the property in the kingdom has changed hands at least once, it cannot be said that the procedure will have been simplified.

As surveyors, however, we are not closely concerned with the niceties of conveyancing law; but the statutes in question make important changes which surveyors ought to know if they are to deal with the matters coming before them in the best interests of their clients.

The scheme of the Papers presented to you to-night ensures that separate sections will be dealt with by different members, with the intention that matters having a close likeness shall be dealt with together for the purpose of simplification in preparing the Papers and for readiness of reference for members of The Institution, for whose benefit these Papers are primarily prepared.

My function is to deal with the Law of Property Act, 1925, so named. In view of the curious diversity of the subject dealt with, it is almost impossible to give anything approaching a connected survey of "surveyor's points" on this part of the Acts, and the various subjects must be dealt with more or less as they arise on consideration of the statute. A very rough generalisation may, however, be adopted, such as (i.) provisions of the statutes affecting the property itself; (ii.) provisions affecting the method of dealing with the property; and (iii.) changes made in the arrangements for the disposal of property.

Party Structures.—In future, where a wall or other structure may be a party-wall or structure, with inchoate rights of adjoining owners in the whole structure, it will be regarded as severed vertically between the adjoining owners, with such rights of support and user over the rest of the structure as may be necessary for conferring rights corresponding to those which previously existed, and these provisions are to apply to all such structures existing at the passing of the Act. If there is any question in dispute on the subject, an application may be made to the Court to declare the rights of the parties under these provisions of the Act. (See Sections 38 and 39, and Schedule I., Part V.)

Undivided Shares in Land.—The Act abolishes undivided shares in land, and Part IV. of the First Schedule makes complete provision for vesting in various circumstances the entirety of the land in trustees (Section 39).

Open Spaces.—Similarly, with regard to open spaces, where, immediately before the passing of the Act, an open space was held in undivided shares, in respect of which each owner had some rights of access or user, the ownership of this open space is to vest in the Public Trustee, and in this case also, as with party structures, an interested person can apply to the Court for a declaration of his rights.

Surveyors are quite familiar with the general provisions, particularly in the London area under the London Building Acts, affecting the rights as to party structures; but it is a little difficult to appreciate the provisions as to open spaces. In the absence of any special provision as to what is intended by the term "open space," it might relate to those common lighting areas or spaces in towns over which many owners may have rights of light, air, or access.

Commons.—Sections 193 and 194 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, confer rights of access for air and exercise to members of the public over certain wastes and commons as follows:—

(a) A metropolitan common within the Metropolitan Commons Acts, 1866 to 1898;

(b) Manorial waste, or a common, which is wholly or partially situate within a borough or urban district;

(c) Any land which, at the commencement of the Act, is subject to rights of common, and which the lord of the manor or other person entitled to the soil declares to be within the section by a deed, revocable or irrevocable, deposited with the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

These rights will be subject to any provisions for the regulation of the land, or any by-laws or regulations made thereunder, and also subject to any conditions or limitations imposed in particular cases by the Ministry of Agriculture.

The rights are strictly limited to access and air, and would not include any right to draw a vehicle on to the land or camp or light a fire thereon. For acting in contravention of the statutory provision, there is power to impose a fine of forty shillings. The rights will cease in certain cases where commonable rights are extinguished, and the privileges do not apply to any common or manorial waste which for the time being may be held for defence purposes and in respect of which the rights of common have either been extinguished or cannot be exercised. These rights of access presumably extend the right conferred by the Commons Act, 1876. Mining rights would not be prejudiced by this section.

The general disinclination to sanction enclosure of common land is reinforced by Section 194, which makes it unlawful, without the consent of the Ministry of Agriculture, to obstruct, by a fence or building, access to any land which is subject to rights of common. There is a saving in favour of statutory undertakings, and this restriction would cease to operate in some cases where the commonable rights are extinguished.

Easements.—Section 65 deals with a legal point as to the form in which a reservation of an easement, or other right, may operate. Hitherto, under the provisions of previous legislation, it was possible for a right to be reserved to the vendor or some other person by means of a use without the execution of a deed. These old statutes have now been repealed, and Section 65 of the 1925 Act creates a legal right in respect of that reservation, although the grantee does not execute the deed itself.

Management. — Sections 121 and 122 deal with rent charges, and contain special provisions for recovery, including the right to distrain.

Section 121, while re-enacting the provisions of the Acts of 1881 and 1911, is adapted to meet the new circumstances whereby the only legal rent-charge which will be possible after 1925 will be a rent-charge in possession, and will be either perpetual or for a term of years. Any other rent-charges will be equitable only.

Section 122 is a new provision allowing a rent-charge or other annual sum to be granted out of another rent-charge (not being rent incident to a reversion). In this event, where the sum due is unpaid, the remedy is not by way of distraint, but by the appointment of a receiver, in a similar manner to the appointment of a receiver in connection with a mortgage.

Restrictive Covenants.—Section 84 is of considerable importance, and carries much further the powers already authorised by Parliament in certain limited cases to vary restrictive covenants which have all the force of legal circumstances. It will be remembered that under Section 27 of the Housing Act, 1919, which has now been re-enacted in Section 102 of the Housing Act, 1925, there was a right of appeal to the county court against a restrictive covenant in a lease or other instrument where the character of the neighbourhood has changed and a house cannot readily be let for occupation as one tenement only. This right is limited, however, to houses required for providing rehousing accommodation, and is not of general application.

Section 84 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, enables any person interested in land to apply to a tribunal established by that section to discharge wholly or partially, or to modify, any restrictive covenant affecting the land, on being satisfied that, by reason of changes in the character of the property or the neighbourhood or other circumstances of the case, which the tribunal might consider to be material, the restriction ought to be deemed obsolete, or that its continued existence would impede the reasonable user of the land for public or private purposes without securing any practical benefits to other persons, or would, unless modified, impede such user. If the persons of full age and capacity entitled to the benefit of the restriction, whether in respect of estates in fee simple or any lesser estates or interests in the property to which the benefit of the restriction is annexed, have agreed, either expressly or by implication, by their acts or omissions, to the same being modified, the tribunal may, if satisfied, order the discharge of the restriction. Further, if the tribunal is satisfied that the proposed discharge or modification would not injure the persons entitled to the benefit of the restriction, they may also discharge it.

There is a provision that no compensation should be payable by reason of any advantage accruing to the owner of the land affected by the restriction unless the person entitled to the benefit of it also suffers loss in consequence of the discharge or modification, nor shall the amount of it be more than the amount of his loss, but this provision is not to affect any right to compensation where the person claiming the compensation proves that by reason of the imposition of the restriction the amount of the consideration paid for the acquisition of the land was reduced.

The section further provides that the Court shall have power to declare, on the application of any person interested, whether or not in any particular case any freehold land is affected by a restriction imposed by any instrument, or to declare what, upon the true construction of any instrument purporting to impose a restriction, is the nature and extent of the restriction thereby imposed, and if so enforceable, and by whom.

The tribunal to whom these matters are to be referred for assessment is defined in the section as "such one or "more of the official arbitrators appointed for the pur- "poses of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compen- "sation) Act, 1919, as may be selected by the Reference "Committee under that Act."

The Reference Committee may make rules in relation to applications under this section and prescribe the fees payable.

The section applies to restrictions, whether subsisting at the commencement of the Act or imposed thereafter, but not where the restriction was imposed on a disposition made gratuitously or for a nominal consideration or for public purposes. It applies mainly to freehold land, but also to leaseholds not being mining leases created for more than 70 years if 50 years of the term have expired.

Forfeiture.—Section 146 consolidates the provisions of previous legislation with one important amendment, namely, that the provisions requiring a lessor to give notice before forfeiture and giving the court power to grant relief will extend after 1925 to a covenant or condition against assigning, underletting, parting with the possession or disposing of the land leased, provided the breach of covenant is committed after 1925. Breaches of such a covenant committed before 1926 will still, apparently, be outside the section.

A further amendment by this section is to the effect that an underlessee is expressly authorised to ask for relief even where the head lease is forfeited for non-payment of rent. The amendment appears, however, to be merely for the purpose of giving effect to a decision of the King's Bench in 1904. Otherwise, forfeiture and relief in case of non-payment of rent are excepted from Section 146, being still governed by the old legislation.

Decorative Repairs.—Section 147 appears to extend the policy embodied in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, by providing that after notice relating to internal decorative repairs is served on the lessee, the lessee may apply to the Court, and the Court may, if it thinks the notice unreasonable, grant the lessee relief wholly or partially from such repairs. One of the considerations the Court may take into cognisance is, in particular, the length of the lessee's term or interest remaining unexpired. The section does not apply (i.) where the liability arises under an express covenant or agreement to put the property into a state of decorative repair and the covenant or agreement has never been performed; (ii.) to any matter necessary or proper for putting the property into a sanitary condition or for the maintenance or preservation of the structure; (iii.) to any statutory liability to keep a house in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation; and (iv.) to any covenant or stipulation to yield up the house or other building in a specified state of repair at the end of the term.

It will be observed that while the section will afford a lessee relief, which will include any personal liability to effect repairs, against oppression by the service of a schedule of dilapidations where the value of the lessor's reversion is in no sense injured, it does not relieve a lessee of any reasonable obligation he ought to discharge in preserving the safety of the structure or maintaining it in a habitable condition. The provisions will doubtless meet a large class of cases of which one has heard much during the last decade.

Mortgages.—One of the big changes made by the Law of Property Act, 1925, is with regard to mortgages. As members know, a legal mortgage of freeholds has hitherto been effected by a conveyance of the freehold interest to the mortgagee, the mortgagor retaining a right to call for the re-conveyance of the property on paying any principal due on the original mortgage, with interest. Similarly, with regard to leaseholds, a legal mortgage was effected by way of either an assignment of the whole leasehold interest or by way of a sub-lease.

In future there will be no mortgage by way of a conveyance of the freehold, but by the grant of a leasehold interest for a term of years. In the case of leaseholds where a mortgage operates as a sub-demise, the term for the first or only mortgage is to be ten days less than the term expressed to be assigned, and any second or subsequent mortgage should be for one day longer than the term vested in the mortgagee whose security ranks before him. These provisions are enacted in Part III. of the Act, comprising Sections 85 to 120, and require careful consideration by all surveyors called upon to deal with mortgage transactions.

One interesting question arises as to what influence the changes of form of a mortgage deed may have upon either or both of the two important elements in a mortgage, namely, the valuation upon which the advance is made and the interest to be charged under the deed. I think one may safely say that a valuation for even a long number of years considered as a leasehold must always be less than the valuation of a fee simple, and is reflected in the practice of surveyors of employing different tables in capitalising the income derived from the two classes of property.

Similarly, the rate interest required in connection with the mortgage of a leasehold is generally higher than that required where a freehold is the security, other things, of course, being equal.

It is obvious that there would need to have been special provisions in the case of a sale by a mortgagee under his power of sale when a freehold property is mortgaged to him, although the mortgagee merely creates a term of years, and so Section 88 provides that the conveyance by a mortgagee selling under his power of sale operates to vest in the purchaser the fee simple.

In the event of a mortgagee securing a title by remaining in possession for a sufficient term under the Limitation Acts, even although the term granted to him is leasehold, he may enlarge the mortgage term into a fee simple.

The powers of mortgagees in possession are enlarged so that they may grant leases up to 50 years in the case of agricultural or occupation land, the limit for which is now 21 years, and 999 years for building purposes, an increase on 99 years.

The statute, while leaving the powers to consolidate as before, substantially modifies the power of "tacking."

Existing Freehold Mortgages.—Land vested in a first or only mortgagee immediately before 1926 for a fee simple estate in possession is to vest for a term of 3,000 years. A similar arrangement operates with regard to second or subsequent mortgages, but for a period of one day longer than that of the mortgagee immediately in front of him; and with regard to existing leasehold mortgages, the first mortgagee will have by way of sub-demise a term equal to the term granted less 10 days.

Receivers.—Section 109 of the Act amends the provisions of previous legislation with regard to receivers. Under the present law, a receiver, after paying the mortgagee's interest, has had to hand over any surplus to the mortgagor or to the next mortgagee, but by the new legislation he must, if so directed in writing by the mortgagee, use this surplus towards the discharge of the principal money. A receiver appointed under statutory power must, when so directed by the mortgagee, insure to the extent to which the mortgagee might have insured, and, in addition, under the provisions of Sections 99 and 100, a receiver may have delegated to him by a mortgagee all the mortgagee's powers of leasing and accepting surrenders of leases.

Contracts.—The subject of contracts is dealt with in Part II. of the Act, Sections 40 to 50 inclusive, and although the general character of a contract as required by Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds is re-enacted in Section 40, and does not apparently affect the existing law relating to part performance, express exclusion of part performance and court sales is new in statute law.

Section 42 is, apparently, designed to protect a purchaser from being deprived of the benefit of this part of the Act. Thus it makes certain stipulations in a contract void; for instance, a stipulation that a purchaser should pay or contribute towards the costs of getting a vesting order or appointing trustees, or the preparation, stamping or execution of a conveyance on trust for sale, or of a vesting instrument for bringing the Settled Land Act into force; and, similarly, that an outstanding legal estate shall be traced or got in by or at the expense of the purchaser or that he shall not object to its outstanding.

Under Section 46 the Lord Chancellor is given power to prescribe forms of contract and conditions of sale of land, which, unless a contrary intention is expressed, will apply to contracts by correspondence, and under this section the Lord Chancellor, under the date of 7th August, 1925, published a statutory form of conditions of sale, which in the heading is stated will apply to contracts for the sale of land by correspondence, subject to any modification or any stipulation or intention to the contrary expressed in the correspondence. For reference these are annexed hereto.

Section 47 deals with insurance money on a sale, and it is doubtless intended to reverse the judicial decision which represents the law in the case of Rayner v. Preston (1881). In that case the house was burnt down between the date of the contract and the completion of the purchase, and it was held that the purchaser was not, apart from stipulation, entitled to moneys received under an insurance policy effected by the vendor. Members of The Institution know of the necessity, after signing a contract, of provisionally covering the risk by a temporary policy. Under Section 47 any money becoming payable under any policy of insurance maintained by the vendor in respect of any damage to or destruction of property included in the contract, is deemed to be held or receivable by the vendor on behalf of the purchaser, and must be paid over to the purchaser on completion of the sale or exchange or so soon thereafter as the same shall be received by the vendor.

It is realised, of course, that the section applies only to contracts made after 1925, and is subject to any stipulation to the contrary contained in the contract and to any requisite consents by the insurers and to the payment by the purchaser of any proportionate part of the premium from the date of the contract.

At first it would appear that there would be some interesting problems arising in the relationship of the vendor to the insurers. The essence of an insurance policy is that of an indemnity, and the question might well arise that the insurers would not be prepared to consent, and if this became general it would leave the law as at present.

Section 49 (2) provides that in the case where the Court refuses to grant specific performance of a contract, or in any action for the return of a deposit, the Court may, if it thinks fit, order the repayment of any deposit. While the Courts have in many cases ordered the return of a deposit on such a summons, there is the other class of case in which the Court, having refused specific performance, the purchaser has not been able to secure return of his deposit because the vendor has carried out his contract at law.

Apportionment of Covenants.—By Section 140 the right of re-entry is extended to include a right of determining the lease by notice to quit or otherwise in cases where there has been an assignment of the reversion, so that an assignee of part of the reversion may give notice to quit that part. In such an event, the lessee may, within one month, determine the lease in regard to the rest of the land by giving to the owner of the reversionary estate therein a counter-notice expiring on the same date as the original notice. In the case of leases, however, made before 1882, where the severance was made before 1926, the owner of a severed part of the reversion can only enforce the condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent; but if the severance took place after 1925, the condition may be enforced in respect of the breach of any covenant.

A simple form of the provisions of the Act is embodied in a book bearing the title A Guide to the New Property Statutes, by the editors of Law Notes, which has materially assisted the writer in appreciating some of the effects of the statutes Statutory Form of Conditions of Sale.

NOTE.—These conditions will apply to contracts for the sale of land by correspondence, subject to any modification or any stipulation or intention to the contrary expressed in the correspondence.

They may also by express reference thereto be made to apply to any contract for the sale of land, and may for this or any other purpose be cited as the Statutory Form of Conditions of sale, 1925.

1. The date for completion shall, unless otherwise agreed, be the first day after the expiration of seven weeks from the time when the contract is made, or, if that day is a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday or Bank Holiday, the next following working day.

2. Completion shall take place at the office of the vendor's solicitors, or, if the vendor so requires, at the office of the solicitors of his mortgagees, if any.

3.—(1) The purchaser paying his purchase money or, where a deposit is paid, the balance thereof, shall, as from the date fixed for completion (but subject to the execution of any conveyance which ought to be executed by him), be let into possession, or into receipt of rents and profits, and shall as from that date pay all outgoings, and up to that date all current rents, and all rates, taxes, and other outgoings shall (if necessary) be apportioned, and the balance shall be paid by or allowed to the purchaser on actual completion, and for this purpose the purchaser shall be liable to pay to the vendor a proportionate part of the current rents accrued in respect of the property up to the date fixed for completion:

Provided that all rates shall be apportioned, so far as practicable, according to the period for which they are intended to provide, and not as running from the dates when the same are made or allowed.

(2) Where as respects any rate the date fixed for completion falls between the expiration of the period for which the last rate was made and the making of a new rate, the new rate shall, for the purposes of this condition, be deemed to have been made at the same rate in the pound as that at which the last rate was made, and shall be calculated from day to day.

4.—(1) If from any cause whatever (save as hereinafter mentioned) the completion of the purchase is delayed beyond the date fixed for completion, the purchase money, or where a deposit is paid, the balance thereof, shall bear interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the date fixed for the completion to the day of actual payment thereof.

(2) Provided that, if delay in completion arises from any other cause than the purchaser's own act or default, the purchaser may—

(a) at his own risk deposit the purchase money, or, where a deposit is paid, the balance thereof at any bank in England or Wales, in his own name or otherwise; and

(b) give notice in writing forthwith of such deposit to the vendor or his solicitors; and in that case the vendor shall be bound to accept the interest, if any, allowed thereon, as from the date of such deposit, in lieu of the interest accruing after the date of the deposit, which would otherwise be payable to him under this condition.

(3) No interest shall become payable by the purchaser if delay in completion is attributable to—

(a) a refusal by the vendor to deduce title in accordance with the contract, or to give an authority to inspect the register kept under the Land Registration Act, 1925, or to convey; or (b) any other wilful act or default of the vendor or his Settled Land Act trustees.

(4) The vendor shall, as from the date when interest becomes payable under this condition, have the option (to be exercised by notice in writing) of taking an apportioned part of the rents and profits, less apportioned outgoings, up to the date of actual completion, in lieu of the interest otherwise payable under this condition; and if the said option is exercised, the same payments, allowances and apportionments shall be made as if the date fixed from completion had been the date of actual completion.

The said option shall not be exercisable in any case in which Sub-clause (2) of this clause applies.

5.—(1) The vendor shall deliver to the purchaser or his solicitor—

(a) an abstract of the title to the property sold, or

(b) in the case of land registered with an absolute or good leasehold title, the particulars and information which ought to be furnished in lieu of an abstract, with a written authority to inspect the register, and, in either case, within fourteen days from the date when the contract was made.

(2) Where land is registered with a possessory or qualified title, the abstract (if any) shall only relate to estates, rights, and interests, subsisting or capable or taking effect prior to the date of first registration, or excluded from the effect of first registration, and dealings therewith, and, subject as aforesaid, the foregoing provisions relating to absolute or good leasehold title, shall apply.

6.—(1) The purchaser shall within fourteen days after the actual delivery of the abstract, or of the said particulars and information, whether or not delivered within the time prescribed, send to the solicitors of the vendor a statement in writing of all the objections and requisitions (if any) to or on—

(a) the title or evidence of title;

(b) the abstract or the said particulars and information;

(c) the contract, as respects matters not thereby specifically provided for;

and subject thereto the title shall be deemed accepted.

(2) All objections and requisitions not included in any statement sent within the time aforesaid, and not going to the root of the title, shall be deemed waived.

(3) An abstract of the said particulars and information, though in fact imperfect, shall be deemed perfect, except for the purpose of any objections or requisitions, which could not have been taken or made on the information therein contained.

(4) An answer to any objection or requisition shall be replied to, in writing, within seven days after delivery thereof, and, if not so replied to, shall be considered satisfactory.

7.—(1) If the purchaser shall take or make any objection or requisition which the vendor is unable to remove or comply with, and the purchaser shall not withdraw such objection or requisition within ten days after being required, in writing, so to do, the vendor may, by notice in writing delivered to the purchaser or his solicitor and notwithstanding any intermediate negotiations, rescind the contract.

(2) This condition does not apply so as to prevent the enforcement by a purchaser of any right conferred on him by Section 42 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

(3) If the contract is so rescinded the vendor shall, within one week after default is made in complying with the requirement to withdraw the objection or requisition, repay to the purchaser his deposit money (if any), but without interest, and the purchaser shall return forthwith all abstracts and papers in his possession belonging to the vendor, and shall not make any claim on the vendor for costs, compensation, or otherwise.

8.—(1) The conveyance or instrument of transfer to the purchaser shall be prepared by him and at his own expense, and the draft thereof shall be delivered at the office of the solicitors of the vendor at least ten days before the date fixed for completion, for perusal and approval on behalf of the vendor and other necessary parties (if any).

(2) The engrossment of such conveyance or transfer, for execution by the vendor and other necessary parties (if any) shall be left at the said office within four days after the draft has been returned approved on behalf of the vendor and other necessary conveying parties (if any).

(3) Delivery of a draft or of an engrossment shall not prejudice any outstanding requisition.

9.—(1) If the purchaser shall neglect or fail to perform his part of the contract, the vendor may give to the purchaser or to his solicitor at least twenty-one days' notice in writing specifying the breach and requiring the purchaser to make good the default before the expiration of the notice.

(2) If the purchaser does not comply with the terms of the said notice—

(a) the deposit money, if any, shall, unless the court otherwise directs, be forfeited to the vendor, or, in in the case of settled land, to his Settled Land Act trustees;

(b) the vendor may resell the property without previously tendering a conveyance or instrument of transfer to the purchaser;

and the following provisions shall apply.

(3) Any re-sale may be made, by auction or private contract, at such time, subject to such conditions, and in such manner generally, as the vendor may think proper, and the defaulting purchaser shall have no right to any part of the purchase money thereby arising.

Paper No. 500.

THE SETTLED LAND ACT, 1925.

By C. Herbert Bedells (Member of Council).

For discussion at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th March, and Monday, 12th April, 1926.

I have been asked to prepare a few notes from the surveyor's point of view upon the Settled Land Act, 1925.

The extent of the Act, consisting as it does of 120 sections and 5 schedules, filling 120 pages of official print, precludes, of course, any exhaustive treatment. All I can do is to call attention to some of its provisions, leaving members to consult the Act for further particulars.

Speaking generally, there is very little in our department that is actually new in the present Act. In most cases, the greater powers it gives, and the position in which it places the tenant for life, were anticipated in the Law of Property Act, 1922, and readers of Mr. Sanger's illuminating Paper on that Act, and the discussion which followed it, and of the subsequent Paper on "Some Functions of the "Surveyor under the Settled Land Acts," and the discussion which followed the latter Paper, will be familiar with very much which now appears as the Settled Land Act, 1925.

As, however, the Law of Property Act, 1922, as a whole, never came into operation, and is so largely repealed by this Act, powers which are now contained in the 1925 Act, which were not in the previous 1882-1890 Acts, may fairly be referred to in these notes as "additional" powers, although contained in the 1922 Act.

The outstanding characteristic of the Settled Land Act of 1925 is that it is a Consolidating Act, and, as such, it is of great value and convenience.

The Act applies only to England and Wales.

Part I. of the Act, dealing as it does with the constitution of settlements and their duration, the machinery of vesting deeds, the passing of legal estate under various circumstances, the procedure on acquisition of land to be made subject to settlement and so forth, does not concern us much as surveyors, and the same remark may be made as to the provisions which deal with limited owners—married women—infants and lunatics—trustees of settlements—compound settlements—referential settlements—provisions for vesting of legal estate, &c.

Part II. of the Act, however, deals with the powers of a tenant for life in relation to sales, exchanges, leases, restrictions, options, and surrenders (Sections 38-72).

As to Sales: the Act adds to the powers conferred by the Settled Lands Acts, 1882-1890, the power to sell for a consideration, consisting in whole or in part, of a rent-charge perpetual or terminable. In the case of a rent-charge which is terminable, it is needful to distinguish between the part arising from principal and interest respectively, so that the first may be treated as capital money—a peppercorn or nominal rent may be reserved for the first five years from the date of the conveyance.

With the tenant for life's consent, a sale may be made in consideration, partly or in toto, of fully paid securities of a company incorporated by a special Act, or its equivalent. So easements may be reserved or granted on a sale; fixtures and timber may be taken by the purchaser at a valuation.

The power to deal with surface and minerals separately on a sale, exchange, partition, or mining lease, is now extended to apply to a sale, exchange, lease or other authorised disposition.

Sales are facilitated by powers which not only permit of the shifting of incumbrances and charges from one part of the settled land to another part, but also to capital money instead of land; these also provide for the apportionment of rent, and incidentally it may be pointed out that the tenth section of the Trustee Act, 1925, permits of two-thirds of the purchase money being left on mortgage without certificate or valuation.

As to Exchanges: The power conferred by the third section of the 1882 Act, extended by the fifth section of the Act of 1890 permitting of exchange of land, is now made to cover the exchange of any easement, right or privilege of any kind, whether or not newly created, over or in relation to settled land, and the consideration for the exchange to cover not only land and money for equality, but also easement, right or privilege of any kind over or in relation to other land.

As to Leases: The principal matter to be noted is that the increased terms permissible under the repealed 1922 Act are repeated, viz., 50, 100, or 999 years, for ordinary, mining, and building leases respectively.

The tenant for life may grant a lease with an option of purchase limited to 10 years, the price being either a specified sum or rent or a stated rate or number of years purchase. Notice to the trustees is needful in a such case, as it is indeed for any lease other than a lease authorised by the 1890 Act for not more than 21 years at the best rent; without fine, the leasee being made liable for punishment for waste.

A lease to commence at the expiration of an existing lease having not more than 7 years to run is now within the powers which formerly only authorised one 12 months expectant.

I have seen it suggested that the Act empowers the tenant for life to grant a lease with an option of renewal, but I do not see that there is an express power to do this, although, indirectly, there is the above-mentioned power with regard to reversionary leases.

The powers as to mining and forestry leases are made most elastic in the methods under which rent is determined. It is to be noticed that the provision as to setting aside a proportion of mineral rents as capital is continued, although it has been pointed out that in the case of a tenant for life, not impeachable for waste, entitled as he would be at common law to work the mines for his own sole benefit, he is, by this provision, mulcted of one-quarter of his legal income therefrom.

The provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1922, as to forestry leases are repeated unaltered in Section 41.

The tenant for life has power to take a lease of land, but not to pay out of capital any fine for the same.

As to Surrenders: The right to accept a surrender is confirmed, and also the tenant for life is empowered to accept a regrant of any land granted in fee simple subject to a rent-charge. There still seems to be a doubt whether a money consideration paid to a tenant for life for the acceptance of a surrender can be kept by him, or whether it is capital money.

The power of the tenant for life to dispose of settled land is extended to permit of the granting or leasing of a limited quantity of land at a nominal price or rent, or without payment, for various public, utilitarian or charitable purposes, when such dealing will be for the improvement, development or advantage of the settled land or any part thereof.

Also to apply land for streets, &c., and this at any reasonable time and not only in connection with a building grant as was provided in the 1882 Act. This is an undoubted advantage, because even when there was no such restriction under the 1877 Act, it was held that the court were justified in permitting dedication of the kind only when there was an immediate advantage to be realised by the settled land.

Special powers are provided to facilitate the allocation of land for working-class dwellings, allotments and small holdings; and special powers under safeguards for compounding claims, settling disputes, and varying or releasing covenants or procuring such variation or release, provide the necessary flexibility for administering property under changing conditions.

Greater and more definite powers are given as to dealing with special classes of property, e.g., the principal mansion-house and park, timber, and heirlooms. Under the 1890 Act the principal mansion-house could be sold only with the consent of the trustees or an order of the Court; now in cases of settlements coming in force after the Act it can be sold without such leave if the settlement does not provide to the contrary. In sales of timber the proportion to be treated as capital remains as heretofore, viz., three-fourths.

Additional facilities are given for dealings between the tenant for life and the estate, including the advance of capital moneys to the tenant for life on mortgage not limited as in the Act of 1890 for the purpose of discharging an encumbrance.

Additional facilities are also provided for raising money on mortgage and an extension of the purposes for which it may be raised, and the inclusion in the amount thereof of the proper costs of the transaction. The extinguishing of manorial incidents and the conversion of perpetually renewable leases give rise to compensation to stewards, solicitors, and others, and funds for this purpose can be raised by this method.

Parts III. and IV. of the Act are also most important, dealing as they do with the investment and application of capital money with special reference to improvement (Sections 73-89).

Among the additional purposes for which capital moneys may be used (see Sub-sections (xiv.), (xv.) and (xviii.) of Section 73) will be found the purchase, with the leave of the court, of leasehold interests giving an immediate reversion to settled land, although not having 60 years to run; the payment of expenses incurred in the preparation of plans, surveys, and schemes (or for opposing schemes) under the Town Planning Act, 1925, and any similar previous Acts; expenses incurred with a view to improvement or development of settled land, or in connection with the exercise of statutory powers, including abortive negotiations; and the financing of building operations on settled land.

Section 80 deals with damages for breach of covenant and reverses the decisions under which damages paid by a lessee for breach of a covenant to repair were not capital but casual profits belonging to the tenant for life. Such damages are, as a general rule, to be capital unless the court otherwise directs, or unless they are applied in making good the breach in respect of which they were paid. If, however, the expenditure, if made, would not enure for the benefit of the settled land or any buildings thereon, the Act says the section does not apply. I am not clear what the precise effect of this is. I have a case before me at the moment in which expenditure on the upkeep of defective and obsolete buildings would only increase the cost of maintaining the property, and pro tanto render more difficult the letting thereof. In such a case what should be done by the trustees and the tenant for life with regard to the dilapidation money, and who is the judge ?

The grouping of authorised improvements into the three Parts of Schedule III. is useful and convenient; the subdivision puts into the first part, improvements, the cost of which is not repayable by instalments; in the second part, those the cost of which the trustees may require to be so repaid; and the third, those the cost of which must be repaid. On a comparison of the Schedule to the Act with the Schedule appended to the Settled Land Paper above referred to, it appears that "buildings for farm purposes "other than outbuildings," "tramways," "railways," "canals" and "docks" have been added.

The provisions which facilitate expenditure of a wasting nature by providing the necessary money, subject to repayment by instalments, are valuable.

The "competent engineer" and the "able practical sur- "veyor" still function under the new Act, and the certificates to be furnished by them are still to be the justification for the application of capital moneys to expenditure. The necessity in most cases for a "scheme" which existed prior to the passing of the 1922 Act is definitely negatived by Section 82 of the new Act.

As in the 1890 Act, power is reserved for the court to sanction payment for authorised improvements, even if carried out prior to the Act without a scheme.

Part V. of the Act consists of miscellaneous provisions which do not greatly concern us.

The same remark applies to Part VI., which contains general provisions as to trustees, their liabilities and indemnification, the notices to which they are entitled,

&c., provisions for their guidance in management during minority.

In Part VII. attention may be called to Sections 107, 108, and 109. Section 107 takes the place of the fifty-third section of the Settled Land Act of 1882, which provides that a tenant for life (or statutory owner) shall, in exercising any power under the Act, have regard to the interest of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall in relation to the exercise thereof by him be deemed to bear the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee to those parties.

Section 108 deals with doubts arising in respect of powers under existing settlements and as to conflict between provisions of settlements and the Act, and Section 109 makes it clear that the Act does not prevent larger or additional powers being conferred on tenants for life.

Part IX. is mainly taken up with "definitions," but Section 118 is important as referring to the Fourth Schedule to the Act, which groups together many provisions which are to apply retrospectively.

PAPER 501.

THE LAW OF PROPERTY ACTS.

COPYHOLDS, MANORS, &c.

By H. E. Sherwin (Member of Council).

For discussion at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th March, and Monday, 12th April, 1926.

The matters with which I have been asked to deal this evening, as the result of the passing of the above Acts, are—

I.—Copyholds and Manors.

II.—Custody of Court Rolls.

III.—Perpetually Renewable Leaseholds.

IV.—Leases for Lives.

I.—COPYHOLDS AND MANORS.

I am sub-dividing this part of my Paper as follows:—

(A) Abolition of Copyholds.

(B) Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents.

(C) Compensation for Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents before the 1st January, 1936.

(D) Compensation for Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents after the 31st December, 1935.

(E) General Remarks.

I should prefer to avoid referring to legal points and so to shorten this Paper, but this is difficult as surveyors acting as valuers for lords of manors have to be conversant with copyhold law to enable them to deal with matters which, from time to time, may be referred to them.

The greater part of the unrepealed portions of the Law of Property Act, 1922, unfortunately affects the surveyor's practice. Therefore I am afraid that this Paper must be a somewhat lengthy one.

In this Paper "the 1894 Act" means the Copyhold Act, 1894, "the 1922 Act" means the Law of Property Act, 1922, as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1924, and "the 1925 Act" means the Law of Property Act, 1925.

I refer those interested in the history of the feudal tenure of copyholds to the Paper on the 1922 Act read by Mr. Allister Hamilton (Barrister-at-Law) at the meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire County Branch of The Institution at Liverpool on the 1st October, 1923, of which a copy appears in the Journal for November, 1923.

"Land" includes land of any tenure, and mines and minerals, buildings or parts of buildings, and other corporeal hereditaments; also a manor, an advowson, and a rent and other incorporeal hereditaments, and an easement, right, privilege or benefit in, over, or derived from land, but not an undivided share in land; and "mines and minerals" include any strata or seam of minerals and powers of working and getting the same.

"Minister" means the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

"Prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Minister.

"Copyhold land" includes—

(a) Customary land or customary freehold where the freehold is in the lord;

(b) Copyhold land held for life or lives, or for years whether or not determinable with life with, by custom, perpetual right of renewal; and

(c) Land held in free tenure for life or lives or for years, whether or not determinable with life (but subject to custom) with, by custom, a perpetual right of renewal.

(A) Abolition of Copyholds.

On the 1st January, 1926, all copyhold land ceased to be of copyhold or customary tenure and became the tenants' freehold subject to the following manorial incidents until extinguished by payment of compensation or otherwise:—

(a) Quit-rents, chief-rents and other similar rents and payments;

(b) Fines, heriots and dues, including fees payable to stewards; in lieu of a chattel a sum equal to the value of the heriot has to be taken;

(c) Forfeitures other than for conveying or attempting to convey the freehold, or for alienation without licence; and

(d) Rights of timber.

The 1894 Act is not repealed, but only amended by the Law of Property Acts. I propose to deal with the more important amendments. Those who wish to know how much of the 1894 Act remains should procure the "Extinguishment Rules" hereafter referred to.

Fines and heriots (now recoverable only as simple contract debts) due before the 1st January, 1926, are recoverable before the 1st January, 1932, but, where due after the 31st December last, they are recoverable for six years from the date when payable.

Compensation for loss of office and the fees payable to stewards are set out in the Twelfth Schedule to the 1922 Act and in the "Enfranchised Lands (Stewards Fees) Regulations, 1926," respectively. These, with any costs or expenses of the lord which by the 1922 Act or by agreement are recoverable from the tenant, are added to and treated at part of the extinguishment compensation.

Provision is now made for dealing with a vacant stewardship or a defaulting steward.

As regards land alienated by way of sale, lease, &c., which before the 1st January could not be so dealt with without giving rise to right of forfeiture, fines for such alienation continue until the manorial incidents are extinguished and, if such fines be variable, any dispute is settled by the Minister.

Until the manorial incidents are extinguished, forfeiture is enforceable by action to recover possession after notification in accordance with Section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as re-enacted by Section 146 of the 1925 Act.

(B) Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents.

(1) Manorial incidents affecting enfranchised land will be extinguished on payment of such compensation as is payable as herein mentioned upon the happening of any of the following events:—

(a) Where the compensation is agreed between the lord and tenant before the 1st January, 1936, then upon the execution of the agreement;

(b) Where the tenant serves the lord with a notice after the 31st December, 1925, and before the 1st January, 1936, or the lord serves such a notice on the tenant after the 31st December, 1930, but before the 1st January, 1936;

(c) Where no agreement is reached or no notice is served before the 1st January, 1936;

except that—

(i) Any manorial incident due before the date of extinguishment is enforceable;

(ii) If there are at least 1,000 tenants in any manor affected by manorial incidents, then, on application of the lord or of not less than two-thirds of the tenants, the Minister may extend the above ten years' limit beyond the 31st December, 1935.

(2) Provision is made for the amalgamation of cases for the purpose of ascertaining the extinguishment compensation.

(3) The compensation agreement may be effected outside the 1894 Act (that is at Common Law), or under Part I. (Compulsory Enfranchisement) or Part II. (Voluntary Enfranchisement) of that Act; but resort to Part II. of that Act must not be had unless the Minister consider that course to be the most convenient.

(4) Unless the compensation agreement be effected outside the 1894 Act, the provisions of that Act, as amended by the 1922 Act, apply, but in the absence of any agreement, the compensation will, subject to the provisions of the former Act as amended by the latter Act, be such as would have been payable if the land had not been enfranchised by the 1922 Act.

(5) When the compensation is a gross sum, then the land becomes so charged, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest is payable from the date of extinguishment until the gross sum be paid.

(6) The Minister or an officer of the Ministry nominated by him may, if the lord and tenant wish, assist the parties in arriving at the compensation agreement.

(7) The lord and tenant may agree that any right of the lord saved by the 1922 Act shall be extinguished, or that, as compensation or part there of, the lord shall be granted any easement or right of the tenant, or any right-of-way or other easement over the land affected for the better working of minerals, including the right to let down the surface. The consideration for any such minerals, however, will be settled by agreement only.

The following additional provisions apply to the extinguishment of manorial incidents whether under the 1894 Act or Common Law :—

(i) The lord and tenant must furnish all information including a plan which either party or the Minister may reasonably require.

(ii) If the late copyhold land be intermixed with other land and cannot be identified on the Ordnance Survey map, the Minister, on application of either party, will identify the same on such map.

(iii) No compensation is to be paid for the loss of forfeiture except as is provided by the 1922 Act, nor for any advantage to the tenant by reason of the extinguishment of any other incident not mentioned in the Act unless it be of value to the tenant and a loss to the lord.

(iv) Unless the extinguishment compensation be paid in a gross sum within 30 days after ascertainment, it is payable, unless the parties otherwise agree, by 20 annual instalments beginning on the 1st January following such ascertainment with $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. yearly interest from the date of the extinguishment on the amount of compensation from time to time outstanding, such payment being secured by a terminable rent-charge out of the land.

(v) Unless otherwise agreed, the extinguishment compensation is to be as referred to hereafter, unless, on application of the lord or tenant, the Minister decide that "special customs or other exceptional circumstances" justify variations to be allowed by him. The Minister, subject to an appeal to the Court, may also decide how the compensation is to be borne as between the fee simple and any derivative interests. He may also make a general order for any manor on the application of the lord or at least 20 tenants.

(vi) If the notice requiring the ascertainment of the extinguishment compensation be given by the lord or tenant before the 1st January, 1936, the party giving the notice, except as otherwise provided by the Act, bears all expenses unless the conduct of the other party be considered unreasonable by the Minister, or that a proposal has been unreasonably refused, in which case the whole or a part of the expenses may be disallowed; but the foregoing does not preclude the lord and tenant, if a notice have been served and the extinguishment compensation have not been ascertained, agreeing, subject to the costs of such notice being discharged, to extinguish the manorial incidents by a compensation agreement.

(vii) Unless the parties otherwise agree, any valuation required for ascertaining the extinguishment compensation is to be made by a single valuer to be appointed by the parties, or, if they disagree, by the Minister, who will fix the remuneration of such valuer.

(viii) The Minister may make rules for prescribing procedure and generally for giving effect to the provisions of the 1922 Act. These have been issued, and are known as "The Manorial Incidents "(Extinguishment) Rules, 1925."

(c) Compensation for Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents before the 1st January, 1936.

Fines Arbitrary.

Where a fine is payable on alienation and on death, the compensation is not to exceed the number of years' annual value set out in the Schedule hereto.

In constructing the table a fine arbitrary on admission has been taken on a basis of two years' annual value. Accordingly, proportionate increases or reductions must be made to meet special cases.

A corporation is to be assumed to be 40 years of age.

"Annual value" includes land tax and landlord's property tax, but excludes quit-rent and repairs to buildings. If the annual value be not agreed, the gross annual value for Schedule A Income Tax has to be taken as the basis for compensation, unless the Minister for any special reason otherwise direct, but either party may have the annual value settled by an agreed valuer, or by a valuer appointed by the Minister.

If facilities for improvement exist, or the land have building value, one-twentieth part of the freehold value, to be settled in case of a dispute by a valuer appointed by the Minister, is the basis for annual value.

Fines certain.

When a fine is payable on alienation and on death, half the number of years' purchase as set out in the table applies. Reductions or increases in compensation apply as indicated for fines arbitrary.

Reliefs and Heriots.

These are calculated as for fines certain.

The value of the heriot is the average of the last three heriots taken or paid. If information be not available without undue expenses, the value is to be affected by (a) the nature of the heriot; (b) the character and value of the land; (c) the condition in life of the tenant; and (d) whether the heriot be seizable within or without the manor.

Fines or Heriots payable also on death of Lord.

The compensation is increased according to the nature and amount of the customary fine or heriot payable in the manor on the death of the lord.

Quit-rents and other Annual Payments.

Quit-rents, free rents and other annual rents are now taken at 20 instead of 22½ years' purchase.

Timber.

If the lord under special custom may enter, cut and carry away timber without the tenant's consent, the whole value of the timber is taken less an allowance for repairs. If no special custom exist, and the lord may not therefore enter, cut and carry away without the tenant's consent, half the value of the timber less repairs is taken. Any other custom has to be regarded.

It should be remembered that "timber" may not necessarily mean "legal timber," which in itself appears to be capable of a "concertina" definition according to local customs, although, broadly speaking, oak, ash and elm of a quarter-girth of not less than 6 inches are invariably so regarded. The definition of "copyhold timber" may well be more a will-o'-the-wisp than that of "legal timber."

Forfeitures and other Incidents.

For forfeitures and all other incidents not saved to the lord by the 1922 Act and not otherwise provided for, the compensation is 20 per cent. of the annual value ascertained on a basis similar to fines arbitrary. If the interest liable to forfeiture be less than a customary fee simple or subject to a lease binding the lord, the annual value will be settled as determined by the Minister.

The above applies to forfeitures for conveyance or attempted conveyance of the fee simple, or for alienation without licence, but, if the tenant have unrestricted rights of demising or otherwise of dealing with the land without the lord's licence, no compensation is payable unless the Minister otherwise determine. If the unrestricted rights relate to part of the land, the compensation is adjusted accordingly.

Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common.

The compensation for fines and heriots is based on a single life expectation of joint lives on the tables appended to the Succession Duty Act, 1853. This applies to extinguishment compensation due from trustees for sale, whose expectation of survivorship must be considered, and from co-partners or tenants in common interested in the net proceeds of the sale.

Interest.

5½ per cent. interest per annum due half-yearly is payable on compensation from the date of the agreement or the notice unless the compensation be payable by instalments.

Date of Computation.

This is to be the date of the extinguishment. (See I. (B) (1) of this Paper.)

Escheat and other Reserved Rights.

Escheat under the 1922 Act now passes to the Crown or to the Duchy of Lancaster or of York. No compensation is, naturally, payable. For any rights reserved by the 1922 Act and acquired by the tenant, the compensation is ascertainable by agreement only.

Perpetually Renewable Copyholds.

The extinguishment compensation is twenty times the yearly rent (including additional rent) which would have been payable under the provisions relating to perpetually renewable leases if those provisions were applicable. Until the incidents be so extinguished, the said rent (including as aforesaid) is payable as quit or free rent and, except as may have been paid, is added to the compensation.

It should be noted that a perpetually renewable underlease derived out of an interest in perpetually renewable copyhold land is governed by Part III. of this Paper.

(D) Compensation for Extinguishment of Manorial Incidents after the 31st December, 1935.

Where no compensation agreement has been made nor a notice given before the 1st January, 1936, the following provisions apply:—

(a) After the 31st December, 1935, and before the 1st January, 1941, either party may ask the Minister to determine the extinguishment compensation on the basis hereinbefore stated, when he will appoint a single valuer so to do, but any rent, fine, relief, heriot or fee which, apart from the 1922 Act, would have accrued due between the 31st December, 1935, and the 1st January, 1941, will be excluded.

(b) Any annual terminable rent-charge will commence from the date of the application, and the lord loses interest thereon between the 31st December, 1935, and that date.

(c) No extinguishment compensation will be payable if no such application be made before the 1st January, 1941.

(d) The costs and expenses in default of agreement are borne by the tenant unless the Minister consider the lord's conduct has been unreasonable or that special considerations apply, in which case he may determine how the costs, &c., shall be borne.

(E) General Remarks.

It may be of interest to note that there are at least seven ways in which the Extinguishment Compensation, referred to in I. (C) and I. (D) of this Paper, may come to be assessed—

(1) Voluntarily, before the 1st January, 1936, without service of a notice, independently of the 1894 and 1922 Acts, i.e., under the Common Law.

(2) Voluntarily, before the 1st January, 1936, without service of a notice, under Part II. of the 1894 Act.

(3) Voluntarily, before the 1st January, 1936, after service of a notice by the tenant, independently of the 1894 Act, if the compensation have not yet been ascertained pursuant to such notice.

(4) Voluntarily, after the 31st December, 1930, and before the 1st January, 1936, after service of a notice by the lord, independently of the 1894 Act, if the compensation have not yet been ascertained pursuant to such notice.

(5) Compulsorily, before the 1st January, 1936, after service of notice by the tenant under Part I. of the 1894 Act.

(6) Compulsorily, after the 31st December, 1930, and before the 1st January, 1936, after service of notice by the lord under Part I. of the 1894 Act.

(7) Compulsorily, after the 31st December, 1935, and before the 1st January, 1941, after application to the Minister under Part I. of the 1894 Act.

The above can be supplemented if regard be had to I. (B) (ii.) of this Paper.

Reading the 1922 Act as a whole, the conclusion to which I come is that the Legislature is not anxious to encourage voluntary enfranchisements under Part II. of the 1894 Act, but under the Common Law.

I am further of the opinion that the course hitherto adopted, namely, of the lord and tenant employing valuers, should continue to be followed, as it is important to remember that gross annual value for Schedule A is only applicable in default of agreement of the annual value, and then subject to—

(1) Either party requiring the annual value to be assessed by an agreed valuer appointed by the Minister, and

(2) The annual value being based on the capital value in certain cases.

I suggest that it falls within the province of members of our profession solely to consider whether there be facilities for improvement or the land have a present or prospective building value.

Then take the case of "tied" licensed premises. My experience has been that Schedule A in most cases bears no comparison with the freehold value which is affected by the trade done. If this be found so, then it seems to me clearly a case in which Schedule A should not be adopted.

The above points are raised as no provision is made in the 1922 Act for valuers acting for lords or for tenants, but only for the settlement of the extinguishment compensation as previously stated by a single valuer, whose remuneration is settled by the Minister.

As I view the position, the scale of valuers' fees issued by the Ministry in July, 1920, no longer has legal effect, but is abolished by "The Manorial Incidents (Extinguish-" ment) Rules, 1925," but I think that most surveyors will continue to adopt that scale.

Minerals.

The rights of the lord or tenant in any minerals, as previously indicated, remain unaffected, but the tenant may remove soil for roads, drains and buildings or for obtaining water, but any rights reserved to the lord may, if he agree, be extinguished. But it must be always remembered that minerals and other rights of the lord preserved by the 1922 Act, e.g., fairs, markets, rights of sporting and fishing will be lost under Common Law extinguishments unless specifically reserved.

Commons and Rights of Common.

All rights of common became attached to the freehold on the 1st January.

The public, subject to certain provisions and excluding certain commons used for military purposes, have rights of access for air and exercise to any common coming within the Metropolitan Commons Acts, 1866-1898, to any manorial waste or common wholly or partly within a borough or urban district, and to any land which on the 1st January was subject to rights of common and to which Section 193 of the 1925 Act may from time to time be applied in the manner therein provided, but this is not to prejudice the rights of any person to win and remove minerals or to let down the surface.

Liability for Repairs, &c.

Liability (whether by Court Leet Regulation, or otherwise) for constructing, maintaining, cleansing or repairing dykes, ditches, canals, sea or river walls, piles, bridges, levels, ways, and other works required for the protection or general benefit of land within the manor or for abating nuisances therein continues, and any person interested may apply to the Court, which is given certain powers.

Copyholds held in undivided shares.

Freeholds of copyholds held in undivided shares vest in trustees for sale in accordance with Sections 34 and 35 of the 1925 Act.

Royal Parks and Gardens.

Provisions are made for the protection of Royal parks and gardens vested in the Crown or Duchy of Lancaster. These empower the Commissioners of Works to enter upon all enfranchised land adjoining or separated by a road or a boundary wall from any Royal park or garden and to repair, &c., such walls, and by deed (a duplicate copy of which has to be handed to the owner of the land affected) to impose upon such enfranchised land such repairing covenants as regards any such wall and such provisions as regards character, height and elevation, towards the park or garden, of any future building or of any alteration of any existing building as they may deem necessary, but the tenant must have one month's notice of the intention to execute the above deed with particulars of the provisions, &c., therein, and the Commissioners have to consider objections made within the above month.

On and after the 1st July, 1926, the Commissioners must, within three months after receipt of notice, declare any repairing and restrictive covenants, &c., intended to be imposed on any such enfranchised land which has not then been dealt with by deed, and if they fail so to do, such land is freed from any such covenants, restrictions, &c.

Copyhold Grants for Lives or Years without Right of Renewal.

As from the 31st December, 1925, copyhold grants for a life or for lives, or for years without a right of renewal, are converted into leaseholds for life, or for lives or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or for a corresponding legal term of years absolute as the case may be, and the lord may re-enter after thirty days' default in payment of rent or on non-performance or breach by the tenant of any services, covenants, &c., but subject, where applicable, to relief against forfeiture under Section 146 of the 1925 Act.

The above leaseholds are then coverted into leaseholds for 90 years under Section 149 (6) of the 1925 Act as mentioned in Part IV. of this Paper.

II.—CUSTODY OF COURT ROLLS.

The Master of the Rolls, who may make all necessary rules, has charge and superintendence of all manorial documents, which, however, remain in possession or under the control of the lord, who may be directed to transfer them to the Public Record Office or to any public library, museum or historical or antiquarian society which may be willing to accept them.

" Manorial documents " exclude deeds and other instruments required for evidencing the title to a manor.

The right of any person to the production and delivery of copies of any manorial documents, or to have the same kept in a proper state of preservation, remains unaffected, and such documents must be produced to the lord free of cost.

Court rolls may be inspected at any reasonable hour by any person interested in any enfranchised land in any manor on payment of the fee prescribed by the Lord Chancellor.

III.—PERPETUALLY RENEWABLE LEASEHOLDS.

" A perpetually renewable lease or underlease " means a lease or underlease the holder of which is entitled to enforce the perpetual renewal thereof, and includes a lease or underlease for life or lives or for a term of years, whether determinable with life or lives or not, which is perpetually renewable as aforesaid, but does not include copyhold land held for a life or for lives or years, whether or not determinable with life, where the tenant had before the 1st January, 1926, a right of perpetual renewal.

For the purpose of converting into long terms perpetually renewable leases and underleases, for preventing the creation of perpetually renewable leasehold interests and for providing for the interests of the persons affected, the following provisions have been made :—

(1) Perpetually renewable leases and underleases have been automatically converted into terms of 2,000 years, without the right of renewal, from the date at which the existing term or interest began, at the rent and subject to any lessees' covenants and conditions payable or enforceable under the lease.

(2) Any contract entered into after the 31st December, 1925, for the renewal of a lease or underlease for a term exceeding 60 years from the termination of the lease or underlease, and whether or not contained in the lease or underlease, shall (subject to certain express provisions of the 1922 Act) be void.

(3) Any lease or underlease at a rent or in consideration of a fine for life or lives or for any term of years determinable with life or lives, or on the lessee's marriage, made before or after the 1st January, 1926, or created by virtue of the provisions of Part V. (Abolition of Copyholds) of the 1922 Act takes effect as for a term of 90 years determinable after the death or marriage as the case may be of the original lessee or of the survivor of the original lessees, by at least one month's notice by either party to determine the same on one of the quarter-days applicable to the tenancy, subject to certain provisions set out in Section 149 (6) of the 1925 Act.

(4) The provisions of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act, 1908, with reference to rights of renewal are not affected.

(5) Every lease, &c., for 2,000 years will be deemed to contain power (if the party interested in any derivative interest prejudicially affected consent) for the lessee or lessees by 10 days' notice before the lease or underlease would, but for the Act, have expired, if it had not been renewed after the 31st December, 1925, to determine the lease or underlease on the original date of expiry.

Also a like power with a like consent to determine by a like notice the lease and underlease at the time at which, if the Property Acts had not been passed, and all renewals had been made, the lease or underlease would have expired.

Taking, for instance, the case of land leased for 21 years from Lady-day, 1920, with the right of renewal every 21 years, the effect is to extend the lease to Lady-day, 3920, but the lessee can, by notice to quit, determine the lease at Lady-day, 1941, or 1962, or 1983, &c.

The lessee has to produce his lease to the lessor before the 1st January, 1927, with evidence of his right of renewal, when the lessor must make an appropriate endorsement on the document.

An important alteration is made by the 1925 Act as regards repairing covenants, for instance, which interests surveyors, I think. Before the 1st January, 1926, a lessee assigning to a third party remained liable on his covenants with the lessor, but, where a perpetually renewable lease is converted into a statutory lease of 2,000 years, the lessee ceases to be liable for breaches of conditions and covenants (including rent) except while the term was vested in him.

(6) For any fine, &c., including a heriot payable by the lessee or underlessee on renewal and not commuted, additional rent for the term created by the new Acts is payable by equal yearly instalments of additional rent of an amount which, in default of agreement, unless the Minister, having regard to the practice and other circumstances of the case, otherwise direct, is to be ascertained on the basis of the fines and other payments which would have been payable on the occasion of the first renewal after the 31st December, 1925.

If there be a right of renewal at different times or dates when the fine, &c., payable are not fixed in the demise, special provision is made in the 1922 Act.

Subject to the order of the Minister or of the Court to the contrary, in default of agreement the additional rent will be ascertained by an actuary appointed by the Minister.

A percentage of 5 per cent.—(see "Renewable Leasehold Regulations, 1925")—of the annual value of land (ascertained as for extinguishment compensation) is added to fines, &c., for the loss of the lessor's right of re-entry (present or future), if the right of renewal be not exercised and the lessee be liable to forfeit such right if default be made in paying any fine.

(7) Interest on unpaid additional rent for unpaid fines may be payable.

(8) The lessor and lessee or underlessee may agree—

(a) to the discharge or commutation of any claim for additional rent or any part thereof;

(b) the amount and date of payment of additional rent;

(c) the interval between the dates of renewal;

(d) the dates on which the lessee or underlessee has power to determine the term;

(e) the rent and additional rent to be apportioned on any part of land in the lease or underlease.

(9) The costs of and incidental to any such agreement and negotiations are to be borne by lessee or underlessee.

(10) The additional rent or commutation amount is to include such compensation for the fees of the lessor's officer, solicitor or other agent (unless work be unnecessary), for which the lessee or underlessee would have been liable on renewal.

(11) The Minister determines disputes on the following matters when the parties may be represented by solicitors or counsel :—

(a) The amount or date of the payment of the additional rent or the commuted amount thereof;

(b) The rent adjustment or apportionment;

(c) The compensation for the fees of the lessor's officer, solicitor, or other agent, or of instructions to the actuary.

The Minister also determines as to the payment of costs of the above application to him.

(12) Disputes referred to the Minister under paragraph No. 11 above are determined under the Arbitration Act, 1889; and

(a) unless either party within seven days after receipt of notification of the Minister's intention to appoint a person as arbitrator object, the Minister may appoint an officer of the Ministry or some other person so to act, and to make an award on his behalf; or

(b) the Minister may appoint any officer of the Ministry or other person to hear the parties, their solicitors or counsel and witnesses and to report to him to enable him to make an award. The person so appointed will have powers of an arbitrator.

IV.—LEASES FOR LIVES.

Any lease or underlease, at a rent, or in consideration of a fine, for life or lives or for any term of years determinable

with life or lives, or on the marriage of the lessee, made before or after the 1st January, 1926, or created by virtue of that part of the 1922 Act which deals with the abolition of copyholds, shall take effect as a lease, underlease or contract therefor, for a term of 90 years determinable after the death or marriage (as the case may be) of the original lessee, or of the survivor of the original lessees, by at least one month's notice in writing to expire on one of the quarter-days applicable to the tenancy, or if there be no quarter-days specially applicable then on one of the usual quarter-days.

The person in whom the leasehold interest is vested by virtue of the above part of the 1922 Act is for the above purpose to be deemed an original lessee.

If the lease, underlease, or contract therefor be made determinable on the dropping of the lives of persons other than the lessees, then the notice may be served after the death of any person or of the survivor of any persons (whether or not including the lessees) on the cesser of whose life or lives the lease, underlease, or contract is made determinable, instead of after the death of the original lessee or of the survivor of the original lessees.

I should like to say that I have written this Paper more particularly to give members, who hitherto have not had dealings with copyholds, a bird's-eye view of the present position from the valuer's point of view, as I feel sure that many members of The Institution will unexpectedly be consulted on a subject about which, on the 1st January last, they may have said, "Well, thank goodness copyholds are no "more"; only to find that there may be at least fifteen years' "life in the old dog yet."

Paper No. 502.

THE TRUSTEE ACT, THE UNIVERSITY ACT, LAND CHARGES ACT, ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATES ACT, and THE LAND REGISTRATION ACT.

By Sir John Oakley (Past-President).

For discussion at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th March, and Monday, 12th April, 1926.

The five statutes which I have been asked to deal with this evening are the Trustee Act, the University Act, the Land Charges Act, the Administration of Estates Act, and the Land Registration Act, all of 1925.

In all they comprise 345 sections and a number of schedules, covering a large amount of ground and introducing considerable changes in the law of property. Those, however, which may be looked upon as peculiarly affecting the surveyor, as distinct from other persons interested in property, are not numerous. I will endeavour to bring them shortly to your notice, dealing with the several statutes seriatim.

The Trustee Act, 1925.

It would appear that various amendments in statutes applying to trustees were made in the Law of Property Acts of 1922 and 1924. Fortunately for surveyors, and possibly more so for solicitors, the position has been very much simplified by the statutory provisions as to trustees being now consolidated by the Trustee Act of 1925.

The bulk of this new statute is old law, and in the few following remarks I will, as before stated, endeavour only to deal with such variations as apply to surveyors. They are not very numerous so far as surveyors are concerned, and are, I think, entirely embraced in Part II. of the Act.

The powers given to trustees in connection with the exercise of a trust for sale or power of sale under the 1893 Act are present in Section 12 of the 1925 Act, and I think with only three alterations :—

(1) This section applies irrespective of when the trust came into operation, whereas under the 1893 Act these provisions only applied to instruments coming into operation after 1881.

(2) Trustees will now be able to sell part of the land within their trust, whether the division is horizontal, vertical, or made in any other way. It will be seen at once that this embodies important power to the trustees by which they can, without first obtaining leave, sell surface and minerals apart.

(3) It is made quite clear that express power to sell settled land cannot be exercised where the power is not vested in the tenant for life or statutory owner, and Sub-section (1) of Section 12 practically says that the trustees with power of sale may do everything necessary for the exercise of the power without being answerable for any loss. Even with this protection, it seems to me, speaking now as an acting trustee in many cases, and not for the moment as a surveyor, that a trustee would be very unwise to act under the powers of the sub-section without taking professional advice on, for instance, such matters as value and method of sale.

Although possibly not particularly affecting a surveyor as such, Section 18, dealing with the devolution of powers or trusts, should be read and borne in mind, as provisions in this respect vary considerably from the 1893 and 1911 statutes. Under this section a trust may be exercised by the survivor of two or more trustees, or, where none remain, by the personal representative of the last surviving trustee until a new trustee is appointed.

Section 20 introduces a useful new provision in connection with fire insurance of trust property, in that it is now made clear that any moneys received under this heading by the trustees or a beneficiary in respect of property subject to a trust becomes capital money, if the policy has been kept up under the trust or under any obligation by a tenant for life impeachable for waste.

Section 22, Sub-section (3), is interesting in that it would seem to give trustees additional powers to employ qualified valuers, whose valuations made in good faith will be binding on all persons interested in the trust. This section must be read as a whole, and when this is done, it will be seen that this provision is only in respect of interests falling into the estate and not previously actually vested in the trustees.

No definition is given of "duly qualified," but it doubtless covers a "chartered surveyor."

Section 23 confers a wide power of delegation under which trustees are released from acting personally, and may employ and pay almost any one "to transact any business or "do any act required to be transacted or done in the execution "of the trust," and are free from any liability for the agent's default if employed in good faith. These powers of delegation appear to me considerably wider than before, and to be subject to one limitation, viz., that trustees remain liable as heretofore if they permit money, valuable consideration or property to remain in the hands or under the control of the banker or solicitor for a period longer than reasonably necessary for paying over or transferring to the trustees.

Section 26 extends and enlarges the scope of protection to trustees in respect of rents and covenants.

The additional protection, put shortly, relieves trustees from any liability in respect of rents and covenants contained in a lease, any rent or covenant made in consideration of a rent-charge, and any indemnity given in respect of the foregoing, provided they have satisfied all such liabilities up to the date of the conveyance by them, and made provision for meeting any fixed or ascertained sum to be laid out on the property, and consequently they may proceed to distribute the real and personal estate without any liability.

Section 57 of Part IV. of the Act should be mentioned as the wide powers given to the court by this section may result in important additions to the ability of trustees to deal with trust properties outside the terms of the trust. Prior to this enactment the powers of the court to sanction a breach of the trust have been very limited, and in some instances, I think you will agree with me, were too narrow.

There are various other interesting sections of the Trustee Act, 1925, which do not specially appeal to a surveyor, so are not dealt with here. I will, therefore, instance only such sections as deal with investment, delegation of the powers of a trustee whilst absent abroad, and provision of income for tenant for life during his minority.

In conclusion, I may mention that the Act applies, except when otherwise provided, to trusts, including (so far as this Act applies thereto) executorships, administrationships, constituted before or after its commencement, and the powers conferred therein are in addition to those conferred by the trust instrument, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein.

Universities and College Estates Act, 1925.

Prior to the 1925 Act the universities and college estates were controlled by five statutes, viz., 18 Elizabeth, cap. 6, and the Universities and College Estates Acts of 1858, 1860, 1880, and 1898.

The foregoing Acts are all repealed in their entirety, I think, therefore, I am right in saying that the Act of 1925 is almost entirely a re-enactment in a consolidated form together with amendments effected by the Law of Property Act, 1922 and 1924. The 1925 Act, which contains 45 sections and two schedules, in addition to the great advantage of consolidation, has other advantages over the provision in the five Acts which have been repealed.

If one may use the expression, the new Act brings estate management more up to date, to the universities and colleges collectively, who are very large property-owners, while at the same time it would appear to provide sufficient control in all material matters by the general provisions of the statute, more particularly the provision for first obtaining the consent of the Minister af Agriculture and Fisheries which appears in various sections.

Speaking generally, it may be said that the amendments are mainly in the direction of assimilating the powers of disposition over university and college estates to those of a tenant for life under the Settled Lands Act.

Under Section 42 of the Law of Property Act, 1922, the authorities of universities and colleges enjoyed similar powers to those given to tenants for life with regard to the length of leases which they were permitted to grant, viz., building leases up to 999 years, mining leases 100 years, and any other leases 50 years. Under Section 6 of the 1925 Act these powers have been reduced, and now revert to what they were under the old Universities and College Estates Act, viz., building leases 99 years, mining leases 60 years, and other leases 21 years. This section, however, must be read in conjunction with Section 21, which gives very wide powers to universities and colleges to enter into "transac-" tions" (which includes leases) likely to be of advantage to the college lands, provided that such transactions are sanctioned by the Minister of Agriculture. Presumably, therefore, where a good case could be made for a lease being granted for a longer period than would be allowed under Section 6 without sanction by the Minister, no substantial difficulty would arise.

Section 3 gives a college authority contemplating a sale of land the option of accepting wholly or partially in consideration thereof a perpetual or terminable rent. It also lays down provisions for dealing with the division of the rent between capital and interest for the payment to the Minister of the part attributable to capital, and as to how he shall deal with it.

Section 6 deals with the terms of leases, to which I have already referred.

Under the heading of "Miscellaneous Powers" several of the sections are important, and, I think you will agree with me, deal with practical points which frequently come before the surveyor.

For instance powers are given —

To grant water rights to statutory bodies (Section 14);

To grant land for public and charitable purposes, in this case subject to the consent of the Minister, and with a limitation as to the area to be so dealt with (Section 15);

To dedicate streets, open spaces, &c., not only on sale or lease for building purposes, but also after a sale or lease, and, in fact, at any other reasonable time (Section 16).

The controlling condition for exercising the last three mentioned provisions is the general benefit of the residents on land belonging to the university or college.

Useful provision enabling a university or college with the consent of the Minister to compromise claims, release restrictions submit to arbitration, &c., is embodied in Section 17; somewhat similar rights in connection with varying leases and grants are provided for by Section 18; and for the apportionment of rents under Section 19, including the right when dealing with such apportionments, to vary or apportion any covenants or condition affecting the lease or grant.

Section 21 is a wide one. Put shortly, it permits the Ministry to sanction any transaction not specially authorised by this Act, which would be for the benefit of land belonging to the university or college, "transaction" being very widely defined by Sub-section (2).

As in the Trustee Act, 1925, the right is given under this Act to deal separately with surface and minerals (Section 22).

Three more important additional powers I should refer to, viz.:—

The right to grant options to purchase or lease, with the natural provision that this right is subject to the consent of the Minister (Section 23);

Additional powers to raise money, again with the consent of the Minister, for effecting improvements together with costs incurred in connection therewith (Section 30);

Provision being made under Section 32 for the discharge of money borrowed.

By the last-mentioned section the maximum period allowed for repayment is fixed at 50 years, provided that in the case of money borrowed before the 12th October, 1898, the period shall not exceed 30 years from the date of borrowing, and in the case of improvements mentioned in Part II. of the First Schedule of the 1925 Act, a maximum of 25 years from the date of the completion of the work.

Finally, Section 37 sanctions the transfer gratuitously to a bishop or other ecclesiastical corporation of any right of patronage belonging to the university or college.

In conclusion, I would point out that the universities and colleges to which the Act applies are the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, including the colleges and halls in those universities, the colleges of Winchester and Eton, and the House of Christ Church, Oxford.

Land Charges Act, 1925.

Very important changes were made in the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, by the Law of Property Acts, 1922-1924. The Land Charges Act, 1925, now incorporates these changes.

In dealing with this Act the definition of "purchaser" must be borne in mind. Unless where otherwise expressed, it means "any person (including a mortgagee or lessee) "who, for valuable consideration, takes any interest in land "or in a charge on land" (Section 20).

This Act deals with charges upon land which I think I am right in saying may now voluntarily be registered, and which, if compulsory registration comes into force, will have to be registered if the owner desires to secure a legal estate therein.

The chief land registrar must, under Section 1 of the 1925 Act, continue to keep a register in the prescribed form of (a) pending actions, (b) annuities, (c) writs and orders affecting land, (d) deeds of arrangement affecting land, and (e) land charges.

Part I. of the Act deals with "Pending actions," and Section 2 states that a pending action means any action pending in court relating to land or an interest therein or charge thereon, or petition in bankruptcy filed after 1925. Unless registered, and re-registered every five years, a pending action will not bind a purchaser, i.e., any person (including a mortgagee or lessee) who, for valuable consideration, takes any interest in land or in a charge on land.

After the commencement of the Act no new annuities will be entered on the register, although those already registered will continue on the register until discharged. Writs and orders affecting land and deeds of arrangement must be registered and re-registered every five years if a purchaser as above defined is to be bound thereby. Re-registration was not previously necessary.

Section 10 deals with the most important alteration effected by the Act, viz., in the meaning of the term "land "charges." By this section certain charges on, and obligations affecting land may (and should), be registered. The nature of these charges are fully set forth in the Act, and may be summarised as follows :—

Class A.—A rent, annuity or principal money being a charge on land pursuant to the application of some person under the provisions of various Acts of Parliament, e.g., the Land Drainage Act, 1861, the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, &c.

Class B.—Similar charges, but created otherwise than pursuant to the application of any person.

Class C.—A mortgage charge or obligation affecting land, of several kinds set out in the sub-section.

Class D.—A charge or obligation affecting land of several kinds described, e.g., in respect of death duties, restrictive covenants, easements.

Class E.—Annuities created before the commencement of the Act and not already registered.

The effect of non-registration of these charges varies in some degree with the several classes described; but dealing generally with the whole, it may suffice to say that a purchaser will not be bound thereby unless they have been registered before the completion of the purchase. Where they have been registered, and re-registered where so required, this will act as equivalent to a notice of the particular charge, or charges, to the purchaser.

Part VI. of the Act deals with local land charges, i.e., charges which a local authority may have acquired over a particular property. These, too, unless registered before the completion of the purchase, will be void as against a purchaser for money, or money's worth, of a legal estate in the land affected thereby.

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

Although this is an Act with some 59 sections and 2 schedules, I think it can be quite shortly summarised from the surveyor's point of view.

Real estate, which is far more explicitly defined than hitherto under Section 3, now means (1) chattels real and land in possession, remainder or reversion, and every interest therein; and (2) real estate held on trust (including settled land), or by way of mortgage or security, but not money to arise under a trust for sale of land, nor money secured, or charged on land, and will devolve on the personal representation of the deceased, i.e., the executor.

A somewhat important change is introduced, with regard to intestates who die after 1925, by Section 33. This lays down that on the death of an intestate, the real and personal estate of the deceased shall be held by his personal representatives (a) as to real estate, upon trust to sell the same; and (b) as to personal estate, upon trust to call in, sell and convert into money. The personal representatives will be empowered to postpone the sale or conversion for such a period as they may think proper, while reversionary interests must not be sold until they fall into possession unless there is, in the opinion of the personal representatives, " special reason for sale," or " unless required for the " purposes of administration owing to want of other assets." This provision as to reversions would seem to in certain cases lay the estate open to long periods before it could be wound up.

Powers of management are given to personal representatives under Section 39, which puts them, until distribution has been completed, in practically the same position as trustees with regard to effecting mortgages, charges, or sales. This would doubtless permit them to employ agents for any of the purposes necessary for the management or disposal of the deceased's estate. By the following section they are enabled to demise land for a term of years absolute to trustees on usual trusts for raising or securing any principal sum and the interest thereon for which the land may be liable, and to grant a rent-charge for giving effect to any annual sum for which the land or the income thereof is liable.

An interesting change is introduced in Part IV. on the distribution of the residuary estate. The existing rules as to the descent of realty are abolished, and real and personal property are subjected without distinction to the same rules.

The Land Registration Act, 1925.

It is, of course, obvious that the amendments in the law of property which will be effected by the various statutes under discussion this evening will necessitate changes in the methods of registration at present adopted where the registration of title is in operation. These changes, however need not interest us as surveyors for the moment. We are more concerned to consider whether the passing of the 1925 Act will extend registration of title to counties or districts where it has not yet been adopted.

As members are aware, registration at present is only compulsory in the following cases:—

(a) in the Administrative County of London;

(b) in the Borough of Eastbourne;

(c) when a county council purchases land for small holding (Section 13 of the Small Holdings and Allotment Act, 1928).

In addition to the above, there is registration of memorials of deeds in Middlesex and Yorkshire.

Any county council can by resolution introduce compulsory registration into the whole or part of its area, though the above list indicates that there has been no general movement to take advantage of this power. Under the 1925 Act this power is continued; but in addition His Majesty may, by Order in Council, declare that on and after a day specified in the Order, being not less than ten years after the commencement of the Act, registration of title to land is to be compulsory on the sale of the land in any county or part of a county. Certain rules of procedure are set out, but as the new powers given for compulsory registration do not operate for 10 years, it is perhaps unnecessary to deal with these in any detail.

TRANSACTIONS

OF THE

SURVEYORS' INSTITUTION

SESSION 1925-1926.

AT THE ORDINARY GENERAL MEETING

Held on Monday, 8th March, 1926,

A DISCUSSION took place on Papers relating to

THE NEW LAW OF PROPERTY ACT.

Mr. JOHN D. WALLIS (President) in the Chair.

The discussion on the Papers on the New Law of Property, already published, was opened, the discussion of Mr. Frank Hunt's Paper on "THE LAW OF PROPERTY "ACT, 1925," occupying the whole evening.

Mr. SYDNEY A. SMITH (Fellow), in proposing a vote of thanks to the author of the first of the surveyors' Papers, said that Mr. Frank Hunt was a gentleman who held very strong opinions as to the duties and the service which every member of The Institution owed to his fellow-members, and, no doubt in preparing his Paper Mr. Hunt merely regarded himself as carrying out a self-imposed duty to which little importance should be attached. He was sure, however, that all the members of The Institution present that evening, as well as the bigger audience who would read the Paper in the Transactions, would wish to convey a really substantial vote of thanks to Mr. Hunt for the great trouble he had taken in preparing the Paper. It was not given to every surveyor to be able to understand a difficult and technical Act of Parliament such as the Law of Property Act, 1925, was, and to be able to condense it into a short, concise and lucid Paper such as Mr. Hunt had put before the members. It rather reminded him of the occasions on which one saw the skilful exponents of some of our games; they made the difficulties appear so stupidly simple as seemingly to make the overcoming of them simplicity itself.

It was interesting to see that the legislation affecting changes in the holding and transferring of property was so extensive that, in order to summarise those points which interested surveyors alone, it occupied no less than 58 pages of the current number of the Journal and had engaged the attention of four Members of Council. He considered it was a very fortunate inspiration on the part of the Council to have invited Mr. Sanger to participate in the discussion on the subject, as Mr. Sanger was one of the leading authorities on the Law of Property, and had been one of the creators of the new legislation. He assumed that Mr. Sanger's presence that evening meant that he had read all the Papers and had passed the approval of the lawyer upon the opinions on Acts of Parliament expressed by surveyors. That being so, it gave him personally additional pleasure to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Frank Hunt, who had developed the surveyors' theme with such legal accuracy.

Restrictive Covenants.—In reading Mr. Hunt's Paper he had been at once attracted by the clauses relating to restrictions. Section 84 appeared to consist of two parts, which surveyors ought to bear very clearly in mind. The first part was the power given to the Court—that was, he assumed, the High Court—it was not the arbitrator, to declare the existence of restrictions, and to define their import and the parties entitled to enforce them. That provision necessarily was, in some cases, a precedent of an application to the official arbitrator for the removal of the restrictions, which was the other part. Obviously no official arbitrator could deal with the difficult points of law which arose relative to the existence of restrictions and the power to enforce them; but even in cases where there might never be an intention to apply for a removal of the restrictions, it would be of great advantage in practice to be able, by the means now provided, to get them defined.

He had been surprised to see how frequently conveyances were made and re-made from one party to another, each of them obliging the successive holders of the land to comply with restrictions named in some deed of which no copy was available. That was not an uncommon experience, and the opportunity of defining those restrictions, quite apart from the ability to modify them, would be invaluable.

It must always be borne in mind that the person who was entitled to enforce restrictions was by no means always in a position to release them. A very common example occurred when a building estate was laid out, because unless the vendor reserved the power to release or vary restrictions, every purchaser from him appeared to have some right to the continuance of them; and the practice of surveyors of introducing provisions to enable a vendor to release restrictions had grown up only in comparatively modern times.

Mr. Hunt had referred to the far-reaching provision by which release of restrictions might be accompanied by compensation, the compensation being limited to the loss of the covenantee. To-day, in common practice, the measure of the claim when application was made for the removal of restrictions was the difference in value of the land as it was —at least, it was based on the difference in the value of the land as it was—and as it would be. His own last experience—probably the final experience which he should have of the old procedure—had related to a house with rather extensive grounds, which was held subject to a restriction that no second house might be built on the land. In the course of time the land had become suitable for different development, and it was now proposed to erect thirty houses upon it. In order to get rid of the restriction it had become necessary to pay the person entitled to enforce it one-half of the difference between the value of the land as used for one house and the anticipated value of the ground rents on the thirty houses. That basis had become quite common practice. He believed it had been adopted by some of the biggest estates in the country, and he supposed there would be considerable loss of anticipated windfalls from failures in future to receive compensation on those lines. After all, the question of the division of the money value of restrictions was perhaps unimportant in the public interests, but it was distinctly adverse to those interests that one party should be permitted to prevent the proper utilisation of land, or at any rate to deter others from using land for its best purpose by reason of the opportunity of claiming excessive compensation.

Release of Restrictive Covenants.—Since Mr. Hunt's Paper had been written, the rules relating to the work of the official arbitrator in the modification of releases of covenant had been issued, and it was interesting to observe how simple the procedure was made. Means were provided for advertisements to be inserted in cases where the persons entitled to enforce covenants were unknown. By the same rules it was provided that where no objections were received, and no claims for compensation made, the official arbitrator might issue an award in the terms of the application without a formal hearing. Again, the fees were restricted to ten guineas a day in cases where not more than £500 was awarded. So it was obvious that the costs of making application for the removal of old and obsolete restrictions were to be small.

He was interested to inquire what would happen if an application was made for the removal of restrictions and a somewhat unanticipated claim for compensation was received. Could the applicant withdraw? He assumed in no case that the compensation awarded would exceed the value of the release of the restriction, because an example of that kind would probably be one in which release or modification would hardly be suitable; but cases might easily occur in which no claim was anticipated, but one received and an award made when possibly the applicant might desire to abandon the proceedings. He wondered if the applicant could do so. Possibly the mere application might operate as a submission to arbitration, and the award be enforceable by the other side.

He observed that one of the grounds upon which restrictions might be released or modified by the official arbitrator was if the reasonable use of the land for public purposes was prevented. It would be noted that this was one additional ground on which restrictions might be modified—not a dominating ground. It might quite well be conceived that it would have been attached as a condition to the release of any restrictions that the proposed removal of the restriction was to be in the public interest. That was not the case in the Act. In the section there was a power given to the official arbitrator to make enquiries of the local authority. The nature of the enquires which were to be made appeared to be undefined. In the text it might appear as if the enquiries were to relate to such knowledge as the local authority might have of the existence of restrictions, or the facts as to changes in the district, but on a broader interpretation he was inclined to think it quite possible the reference to the local authority would be used to introduce opinions or views which the local authority might have as to imposing restrictions somewhat akin to town planning or zoning restrictions on land which was proposed to be released. It would be interesting to see how it worked out. The official arbitrator appeared to have a very wide discretion, and it might be that in exercising his discretion he would have regard to the preservation of the amenities of the district.

It would also be interesting to know whether an application might be made somewhat in advance of the necessities of the case. There were many instances, he assumed, where land was held by people who had no intention whatever of re-developing it in accordance with modern needs, and were prevented from doing so by restrictions, but where they would desire to sell the land and obtain the best price. For example, it might be land held by executors. He wondered if, in a case like that, the executors might apply and get the restriction removed before they attempted to sell. He was inclined to think they might, but it was a little uncertain.

He considered that the section was one section of the Act which was likely to give immediate benefit to the public and to landowners generally. It would have the effect, he believed, of releasing a certain number of areas of building land for re-development, and a certain number of freehold buildings for modernisation; but he believed it would have a vast effect in enabling leasehold properties, which were nearing the end of long terms, to be re-developed on new lines. The immediate effect was likely to be more felt in regard to leasehold property than freehold. The success of the section would depend upon the interpretation which was placed on it. He had felt the inadequacy of the decisions given by the county courts under the Housing Act of 1919. He held the view that the section in that Act had not been given quite such a wide interpretation as had been intended when it was passed. The results had been distinctly disappointing, and it was interesting to observe how very much wider was the section in the present Act. It could hardly have been drawn on a wider basis. It was obviously intended that restrictions should be lifted or modified whenever it was reasonable to do so, and he anticipated that great benefit would flow from it.

Dilapidations.—The Paper which Mr. Hunt had written referred to a number of points on any one of which almost a whole evening might be spent in discussion, and he hardly felt justified in taking up much more of the meeting's time. He did want, however, to say a word about the clause relating to dilapidations. Mr. Hunt had expressed the view that that clause might afford protection in a number of cases of which so much had been heard recently. Personally he felt the section had not gone nearly as far as it should have gone. It seemed to him that the underlying principle of the interim schedule was that the lessor needed to be protected against damage to his reversion, and that protection should be afforded to him while allowing a greater latitude to the lessee than the section afforded. Personally he should have thought that all that was needed for the protection of the lessor until the term neared the end was an ability to secure the maintenance of the external appearance of the property and the preservation of the structure. The tribunal to try disputed dilapidation cases might well have been either the official arbitrator with a limitation of witnesses or an official referee under the Finance Act, or one of the official referees attached to the Courts, or a small tribunal like those set up under the Building Act for party-wall disputes. The whole operation of dilapidation practice, by which an unscrupulous lessor could frighten a lessee by the threat of a High Court action, was wrong.

The system of conveyancing by which mortgagees would in future get a 2,000 years term, in his judgment would make no difference whatever to the valuation of property, because the mortgagee, when the time came when he wanted the freehold—that was, when he wanted to sell it—he got it, and he could convey it.

He desired to propose a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Hunt for his valuable and useful Paper.

Mr. Cuthbert Lake (Member of Council), in seconding the vote of thanks, agreed with every word which Mr. Smith had said in his tribute to Mr. Frank Hunt for the great help he was to every member of The Institution in using in their interests the great powers which he possessed, and in making so simple many of those things which they found very difficult to dissect and to extract from Acts of Parliament, rules, and regulations, and the like.

He looked at the matter, perhaps, from a different point of view—from the point of view of a surveyor in general practice, whose work was mainly valuations. He could add no special item to Mr. Hunt's list of special points of which surveyors should take note. He would only venture to express his view as to how certain of those points might affect surveyors in their work.

The Law of Property Act, 1925, did not seem to him to raise any bogey that surveyors, or their employers, need seriously fear; it did not seem to prejudice either of their interests. It was almost entirely an Act varying and, so far as he could see, simplifying (although his solicitor friends did not agree with him) the lawyer's method of giving effect to contracts. He thought, after about a couple of years' experience of the working of the Act, it would be found very much simpler. He admitted that he found the Act disappointing in one respect. It had 12 parts, 209 sections, and 5 schedules, and they were all absolutely devoid of any humorous incident.

The practical side of the Act, so far as the removal of restrictions, dilapidations and mortgages was concerned, had been dealt with by Mr. Smith, and he concurred in everything that gentleman had said. He would venture certain remarks on one or two points on which Mr. Smith had not touched.

Party Structures.—The first one was that of party structures. It seemed to him that the position as regarded party structures was unaltered in fact and in practice so far as those surveyors who practised in London under the London Building Act were concerned; and, so far as he could see, the variation in practice outside London was so slight as to be negligible.

Open Spaces.—With regard to open spaces, the position was fully met by Mr. Hunt except on one point, and personally, on that point, he was not sure that Mr. Hunt was quite right. Mr. Hunt's words were as follows: "In the "absence of any special provision as to what is intended by "the term 'open space,' it might relate to those common "lighting areas or spaces in towns over which many owners "may have rights of light, air, or access." He had read that remark through two or three times, because it seemed to him quite clear that when Mr. Hunt had written those words he had been a little perplexed—as he himself had been. It was not very often that Mr. Hunt was perplexed, and he had turned to the text-book he had referred to and had discovered that there the editors seemed to skate round the subject. Then he had turned to H. H. King's lectures, given before the Sussex Law Society, and had found that gentleman also seemed a little perplexed about the matter. Then he had taken Wolstenholme and Cherry, who instanced the London squares. That was all very well, but those who practised in London knew that it could hardly apply to any London square. There might be one; he did not say there was not, but he did not think there was one to which that could apply. Then he had gone out on to the pavement of Lincoln's Inn and he thought he had hit on it. The story that had been given him was that somewhere round about Ilfracombe or Coombe Martin in the county of Devon there was a row of 14 houses which had been built many years ago, between which and the sea there was a stretch of grazing land. Those 14 houses had been sold to 14 different owners, each being given a 14th share of the patch in front, and every seven years or so the profits from the grazing of that patch, enjoyed by the local goat, were divided between the 14 owners. It was seriously suggested that when the Act had been in process of manufacture one of its constructors had been bathing in the neighbourhood, and had heard of this, and so he had put it in. Personally he had heard of no other reason for putting it in.

Undivided Shares.—With regard to the point of undivided shares, the abolition of undivided shares in land involved the practical fact that, whereas prior to last January an owner of an undivided share could not compel the owners of other shares to join in with him and sell the property and divide the proceeds between themselves without the cumbersome machinery of a petition action, he could now, without any reason given other than his desire, apply to the court to compel the trustees for sale to perform their duty, and the court might make such order as it thought fit. The cost of the application would not appear to be a serious or an expensive matter, and even without such application the trustees for sale could sell at any time. That meant that the owners of the shares were liable to have their property realised at any moment convenient to them or otherwise, and moreover at any times which might or might not be propitious for the sale of the estate as a whole, but which were propitious to the circumstances of the holders of some of the shares. If that point came to be considered, one did not always want one's shares in an estate sold; it might be convenient or it might not. He had cases in mind where, if there were such a sale, one could hardly expect a sale to take place at a better rate than 8 per cent., and there might be holders of those shares who could not reinvest at a better rate than 5 per cent., and they did not want a sale. The practical effect of the section would seem to be that the value of undivided shares should be appreciated by the fact that it was more readily realisable and therefore it made a better security for mortgage, but it was a more speculative investment because the owner of the interest had no power of fixing the date when the investment might be converted into cash.

Easements.—With regard to easements, Section 65 deemed to leave the matter practically the same as before, but he did not think there was very much to do with easements in that section, as far as he could judge. He hoped that later the members would have some further elucidation on that point.

Rent-charges.—Sections 121 and 122 dealt with rent-charges, and he could not see that they affected the existing position from the estate manager's point of view. He was under the impression, subject to correction, that it had never been possible of late years to distrain where a rent-charge created out of another rent-charge fell into arrear.

Mortgages.—In the case of mortgages, there was a greater freedom given to a mortgagee in possession to deal with property, and that alone should make loans by way or mortgage an even more attractive form of investment.

The effect of substituting a leasehold interest for a long term, for the conveyance of a freehold, did not seem to him a matter which would alter the value of the security. It merely altered the method of securing the loan, and the mortgagee was in a better position to sell than to transfer what in fact—and, as he saw it in law—was the entire interest of the mortgagor. There was another point there. He thought the position of the properties which surveyors looked after was very much improved by it—particularly as regards the powers of a receiver. The provision as to the application by the receiver of his surplus receipts towards the discharge of the mortgage debt should undoubtedly strengthen the position of the mortgagee, and it should improve the property, because it would ease the position of sitting or prospective tenants. The reduction of a mortgage debt itself helped the tenant. A hard-up owner was a hard landlord, and the power to grant longer leases should enable tenants more fully to develop their holding, and should make the property more valuable.

Contracts.—As far as contracts were concerned he did not think surveyors need seriously reconsider their old practice. They had always avoided making open contracts. The man who had not had generally landed himself into some difficulty, and he thought surveyors could sufficiently follow their old accustomed methods. The creation of a contract by correspondence would certainly appear to be facilitated by Sections 40 to 50 inclusive of Part II., and by the statutory form of conditions of sale, and certainly would be less disadvantageous when it was set up.

With the advent of a new Act of Parliament the real difficulty of surveyors was to see whether their markets would be upset and their prices vary ; and looking at it with a valuer's eye, and an estate controller's eye, it seemed to him that the Act was a help to them. It interfered with their practice but very little, and it must eventually distinctly simplify many things. The only thing that had disconcerted him had been a remark of Mr. Hunt's that evening to the effect that the Act would not become effective until every property had changed hands at least once. On hearing that remark of Mr. Hunt's his mind had once gone to three estates for which he acted. In one case they had not bought any property since 1588. In another case they had property which had been certainly in their possession in the 14th century and for many years before, and in the third case the last acquisition had been in 1600. Those were rare cases, but he really thought that within 20 years the bulk of the country would be under the new law.

He concluded by expressing his thanks as an individual to Mr. Hunt for the great help he had given the members in their labours on the subject.

Mr. Graham Mould (Associate) said it gave him great pleasure to rise in support of the vote of thanks which had been proposed and seconded to Mr. Hunt for his extremely able Paper. He confessed that it was at some personal loss he did so, for the reason that it was always a little humiliating to a lawyer when he found how absolutely plain a legal matter was made by a surveyor. When he had entered the room that evening he thought that the Law of Property Act was rather a difficult statute to understand, but, after having listened to speeches of three surveyors, he was now convinced that he had been quite wrong, and that the statute was a perfectly simple and admirable one, and that there would be no trouble whatever in working it out. He ventured to hope that that would be the case, but still he reserved a little idea of his own that things would not be quite so simple as it was suggested they would be.

Nearly all of his best points had been taken away by previous speakers, but he would like to say a word as to one or two matters.

Mortgages.—Mr. Hunt had raised the question—and of course it was an extremely practical one—as to whether, when one was making a valuation for mortgage, any differences ought to be made by reason of the circumstance that what would be conveyed to the mortgagee was to be a term of years. It seemed to him that no difference at all ought to be made. He entirely agreed with the two preceding speakers, and if one looked at the reason of the thing, surely it was the following: The chief reasons why a leasehold was put on a different table from a freehold was because the term was very much shorter than a freehold. Usually there were restrictive covenants. There was generally the onus of an appreciable ground or other rent, and, lastly, there was the liability to forfeiture. It seemed to him that all those four elements, which he ventured to think furnished the chief reasons why a leasehold was valued on a table different from that of a freehold, were absent from the present case, because there was an almost infinite term; whether it was two or two thousand years did not matter. There was no rent. There were no restrictive covenants other than any covenants which would enure as regarded the freehold itself. He did not gather there was any risk of forfeiture; and if one wanted any reason on top of those four reasons (which he did not think one would), it would be the reason which had been put forward by his friend Mr. Smith, that on the one vital occasion when the mortgagee wanted to realise his security he had the power of selling the freehold. When one had considered those points, he thought one might absolutely dismiss any suggestion that, from a surveyor's point of view, any difference whatever should be made in the valuation.

Restrictive Covenants.—The subject of restrictive covenants had already been so fully dealt with that he did not propose to say anything on it except to emphasise the fact that it only applied either in the case of freehold property on the one hand, or in the case of leasehold properties where the lease originally was for more than 70 years and where more than 50 years of that 70 had expired. It was limited to those two cases. It was not a wholesale right to get rid of any objectionable restriction.

extremely interesting. All knew the old advice that used to be given, and was still given: "Do not enter into an "open contract." If one did enter into an open contract now, at all events, it had a considerable number of conditions attached to it, and, as he read it, those conditions dealt with a great number of points with reference to which, if a contract were being drawn in the usual way, provision would be made. The date of completion was fixed in the way that it was to be, roughly speaking, seven weeks from the date of the contract. Then there were provisions made as to the delivery of the abstract of title, and so forth; and in connection with that members might do well to remember that by the Act—he had forgotten the section for the moment—30 years now was substituted as the necessary length of the root of the title, unless otherwise stipulated, in place of 40 years. Then, further, there was a power given to the vendor to rescind the contract by condition 7 if any objection or requisition which the vendor was unable to remove or comply with was made. The language of that was significant. He did not profess to suggest what was the exact meaning of it. He thought he was right in saying that in most conditions of sale it would be found that the precise language used was a condition which the vendor was unable or unwilling to remove or comply with. He noticed the omission of the word "un-" willing" from the statutory conditions, and it appeared to leave the matter so that the requisition must be one which the vendor was unable to remove or comply with.

Then there were provisions as to the deposit money and as to resale. It was, he thought, a little important to remember that when two people entered into quite a simple contract by correspondence—just a couple of letters, one man saying he would sell at a certain price, and the other man saying he would buy at that price—that one had now to read into that those two or three pages of conditions of which probably the vendor and the purchaser alike were ignorant; but they would be, by a benevolent Act of Parliament, read into the contract as part and parcel of it.

Forfeiture.—There were one or two other short points which he would like to mention very briefly. The Act, as members knew, extended the protection given in regard to forfeiture. He was not now speaking of the question of decorative internal repairs; he was speaking of the question that for the first time protection was obtained where a tenant had sub-let or had assigned contrary to the provisions of his lease. That was the one thing prior to the passing of the Act which the law did not pardon. It did not matter if the covenant was framed in the terms that the landlord should not withhold his consent in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant. The lessee had to ask for that consent, and if he sub-let to the Lord Mayor of London without consent, the lease was liable to be forfeited, and would in fact be forfeited. That was done away with. As from and after the beginning of the operation of the Act, there was protection as regarded sub-letting or assignment contrary to a covenant.

Decorative Repair.—With regard to the section relating to internal decorative repairs, he would just like to make the following observation. He thought it rather wise that those things commenced gradually. It was a step, and a very marked step, in the right direction, because the greatest abuse, so far as his own limited experience of the matter went, in connection with schedules which were served (fortunately by a very small proportion of lessors) during the currency of a lease, was in connection with requiring a quantity of internal decorations which, if the lease were a long one, was absolutely useless from the point of view of preserving the interest of the reversioner. The stability of the structure was not really touched by whether a ceiling wanted whitewashing or whether it did not when a lease had perhaps 50 or 60 years to run. It was a very different matter when one came to outside decorations, but when one was dealing with inside decorations that matter had often been abused. He did not know that a tenant was always without remedy. He remembered a case in his own experience a couple of years ago when some people came to him and said, "This is a wicked schedule." He had replied "Of course it is. You are the tenants, are you not?" and the reply had been in the affirmative. He had then said, "Why is the schedule wicked?" They had said, "For "this reason. We were carrying out very substantial "repairs on a big property. We had notice, we admit, "three months ago. We proceeded to carry out the repairs. "We had carried out about half the repairs when the three "months expired and an action for forfeiture was com- "menced. What do you say to that?" He had replied, "I think one can say something to that," and what he had done was the following: He told his clients to put on record on a pleading which, if the action had been fought, would have gone before the court, that the procedure on the part of the landlord amounted to an abuse of the process of the court, and that his clients would bring out those facts in evidence. The result had been that the lessor had withdrawn his action and had paid the costs of both sides rather than face the music which he knew he would have to face if he decided to continue the action.

He ventured to think that they must not be too greedy. The step giving a tenant the protection which the Act did give him was an undoubted advance in the right direction, and he dared say that when they got a later Act of Parliament to amend the present one the tenant might be given still more protection. After all, he thought a few rights should be left to the landlord. Nowadays one did not expect that the landlord would have many, but he might be left a few.

He desired to conclude, very much as he had commenced, by saying how much he personally was indebted to Mr. Hunt for his clear and able summary of the Act, and for having made what was undoubtedly a difficult statute appear so simple.

Mr. P. J. Waldram (Fellow) said the members had good reason to be grateful to the Council for having given them such a unique and convenient method of studying a very long and very tiring series of enactments. They had no less reason to be grateful to the authors of the Papers for the extremely able summaries they had given of those complicated Acts which threatened to affect materially the relation of surveyors to property.

Open Spaces.—There was very little which he could usefully add to the discussion, but one point to which Mr. Hunt had drawn attention, namely, the reference to open spaces, merited some consideration. He ventured to think that Mr. Hunt had rather frightened the members unduly by suggesting that those open spaces would be under the same condition as party-structures, and, that not being defined, they might be held to relate to common lighting areas, or spaces in towns over which owners might have rights of light, air, or access. If that were so, there would be no limit at all to the property which would then be vested in the Public Trustee, because all disputes as to light were with reference to the light received from some open space. Whether it were above or at the side of the house was immaterial; it was an open space. At first sight it looked as if Mr. Hunt's version was correct. He wished that it were so, for it would be all to the good if somebody like the Public Trustee were placed in possession of those amenities of light which ought to belong to the community, and which were frequently absorbed by greedy individuals; but, unfortunately, he feared that the interpretation was inaccurate. The actual words in Part 5 of the Second Schedule were of importance: "Where immediately before "the passing of this Act an open space of land"—he thought Mr. Hunt had omitted the words "of land"—"with or with-"out any building used in common for the purpose of any "adjoining land is held in undivided shares." That certainly could not refer to any lighting area in any town, because although it might be an open space of land uncovered by building it would not be held in undivided shares, but the land itself would appear on somebody's title-deeds or be claimed by the local authority.

Light and Air.—It was interesting to note that throughout the long series of attempts to bring the Law of Property more into accord with common-sense (because that was, he took it, what the Acts really were), there was no mention of that bogey of the law of light which was so frequently referred to as being one of the great injustices of the present day, generally by architects who desired to crowd on to their clients' sites the greatest possible amount of building regardless of the requirements and amenities of adjoining properties. In view of the perennial agitation which arose, sometimes once but generally twice a year, for the repeal of the law of light, or the Prescription Act with regard to light, he thought that omission was not unworthy of attention by surveyors.

Decorative Repairs.—Other speakers had mentioned the matter of breaches of covenants as to decorative repair. It had been his experience—and possibly it had been the experience of many—that fraudulent claims by lessors had in the past been a crying scandal, the blame for which had fallen on surveyors, and unduly so. It had been his good fortune to have come across some years ago a large landowner in London—he would not mention his name—who took a very personal interest in the matter. Through various agencies this gentleman had let it be known, mainly through officers of local authorities, sanitary inspectors, and the like, that he was prepared—or an association which he had formed was prepared—to assist lessees who had been served with unconscionable schedules; and at one time a number of those cases had come into his (Mr. Waldram's) hands. There were people calling themselves surveyors for whose names the roll of The Institution would be searched in vain, who had entered into a conspiracy with some small firm of solicitors—or people who had the heading "solicitors" on their notepaper—and served lessees, preferably poor lessees, and old ladies for choice, with threats that proceedings for forfeiture would be taken in court if a very long schedule were not immediately carried out, and particularly if the solicitors' and surveyors' fees were not paid, those fees amounting possibly to about half a year's rent of the premises. That was not a fairy story. It was an experience which he had come across on many occasions, and not in London alone. The remedy was quite simple. It consisted first of a letter to the particular people employed to the effect that their right in the covenants (they were owners of course, or representing the owners) was a right to call upon the tenant to make good any damage to their reversion, and they were asked to state within a short time, generally a week, what the damage to their reversion was. Of course no satisfactory answer was received. They were then informed that any action they might institute would be defended. Generally nothing further transpired. The number of cases which one had come across—he had, no doubt, other members had come across them also—of poor tenants who had been frightened into paying those extortionate surveyors' and solicitors' fees, and into carrying out repairs which were absolutely useless, had been most distressing. He had taken two or three of such cases into court, in each case into the county court; and in each case the landlord's claim was decisively dismissed. In that connection he could not quite understand the suggestion of a previous speaker that applications for the modifications of useless and onerous covenants must necessarily come before the High Court. It would be very convenient if some of their legal members could tell them whether there were any possibility of action being taken in the county court if the amount at issue were within county court jurisdiction.

Mr. Eustace J. Harvey (Visitor) said he was one of those who believed that the new Acts were far from achieving the simplification which they claimed. Nor did he believe they would have the effect of staving off registration of title. On the contrary he thought that a few years' experience of the Acts would drive the landowners en masse to the register.

He thought he might perhaps claim to have been the first critic of this legislation, because he had brought out in the year 1923 a book entitled "The Law of Property Act, "1922: How will it work?" in which he had examined the chief new schemes. That book had gone before Mr. Justice

Romer's Committee, and a considerable number of amendments had been made in the codifying Acts in accordance with his suggestions. The rest of the book contained the law as it now stood, and he was not without hopes that the rest of the changes which he suggested in that book might yet be effected.

Those who remembered the introduction of the Acts would recollect the language used by their promoters: they were to effect "the greatest simplification that had ever "taken place in the law of real property"; they were to constitute "the poor man's charter"; in future a man was to be able to transfer land "in unlearned phrases." Those words were not used about any of the enactments that had been discussed that evening. They were used about a scheme which was known as the "Curtain Scheme." The Curtain Scheme had been the main object of the Acts, and he did not think members' acquaintance with the Acts would be complete unless a few words were said about it.

The Curtain Scheme would be found in Part I., in part of Part III. dealing with mortgages, and in most of the schedules. It had been brought in, at the instance of the Council of the Law Society, to meet the demands of people who asked, "Why cannot the transfer of land be made as "simple as that of stock?" He was sorry to say that people who used those words must have given very little attention to the subject; but the words had been so constantly repeated that at last the Council of the Law Society took the matter up and instructed counsel to draw an Act with that object. In doing so, the draughtsman followed the system of registration of title, acting on the theory that, by means of what might be called a notional register, all the benefits of registration of title could be obtained without a register and without a registrar.

As was well known, the London Register of Titles recognised only two interests in land—the fee simple and the lease. Accordingly the authors of the Act determined to divide all the interests in land into two classes—on the one hand the fee simple and the lease, which they called "legal "estates," and on the other all the other interests, such as life estates, remainders, restrictive conditions, equitable mortgages and second mortgages, which they called "equitable "interests"; the first part of the Act dealt with this division. What was its object? The whole thing was done for the benefit of one person only—the purchaser. The landowner was to be made to keep two titles—one, a title to the fee simple or the lease, which was to be produced to the purchaser, and the other—containing all the equitable interests —which was to be kept separately and concealed from the purchaser. The title to be shown to the purchaser was the sort of title to be got at the Land Registry, in which would be found no mention of life estates or anything of that sort. To see the object of the Act, one had only to look at the Sixth Schedule, where would be found forms of abstract of title in which some of the abstracted deeds were put in italics and others in ordinary print. The scheme was that in preparing the abstract of title for the purchaser, the vendor's solicitor should, in future, omit all those parts of the old title which were in ordinary print. The title was to consist only of the documents which were in italics. That meant cutting down the title considerably, but the scheme only applied to land held in settlement or in undivided shares.

The question was, Was the scheme likely to work, and was it worth while if it did work? To explain the position to those who were not lawyers was, he was afraid, a very difficult task, and he could throw out only a few suggestions, hoping that members might see at what he was driving.

There was an old division of estates in land into equitable and legal. This the framers of the Act took and elaborated enormously in Part I. Then they came up against the old rule of the Court of Chancery preferring the legal estate. Legal estates were as old as the hills. Equitable estates were inferior ones, which had been admitted, rather under sufferance, by the Court of Chancery, who did not succeed in putting them quite on the same level as legal estates. The main problem in land transfer was that there were so many possible interests in land that it was very difficult for the purchaser to find them all out.

The Court of Chancery held that if, by fraud or negligence, the vendor omitted to disclose a legal interest, the purchaser could not be protected against it; but if the interest concealed was an equitable one, then, if the purchaser had notice of it, he must take subject to it, but if he did not have notice of it, then he might be given priority over it.

This doctrine of the preference of the legal estate was a great disparagement to equitable interests, which in many cases were as valuable as legal ones. As the authors of the Act were creating so many new equitable interests, they were anxious to give them more protection than they had before. They inserted two devices in the Act for effecting this, one by putting them under a trust for sale or a settlement, the other registering them at the Land Registry.

The result of all this had been to convert the position of the equitable interest from a comparatively simple one into a most complex one, based both on the elaborate classification in Part I., and also on the registration at the Land Registry, which would be a very expensive business—much more expensive than the authors of the Act imagined.

His first objection, then, to the Curtain Scheme was that it was not based on a clear principle. The classification and the registration were not both required. Registration alone would be sufficient. From registering all second mortgages, restrictive conditions and equitable interests as was proposed, to registering every encumbrance, legal and equitable, as they did in Scotland and Ireland, was but a step; in the latter case they could abolish the whole distinction between legal and equitable interests, because the purchaser would then have no difficulty in finding every encumbrance. That was his first objection. His second was, Would it work? Would the abstract of title really be prepared in the new form? In the old days the preparation of the abstract was the simplest thing imaginable; but now, if they were going to omit half of the documents, it was a risky thing to do, and a solicitor would certainly not do it without taking counsel's advice. Therefore the preparation of abstracts would in future involve counsel's fees. But the question was, Would the solicitor adopt the new form? He thought not, owing to Section 10 (2), which said: "A solicitor "delivering an abstract framed in accordance with this part " of this Act shall not incur any liability on account of an " omission to include therein an instrument which, under this " section, is to be deemed not necessary or proper to be " included, nor shall any liability be implied by reason of " the exclusion of any such."

This section says that the solicitor shall incur no liability whether he includes in the abstract, or omits, the documents printed in ordinary type. Under these circumstances, unless human nature had completely altered, the solicitor would adopt the easiest course and prepare the abstract in the old way, and the new scheme would go by the board.

Supposing, however, the scheme did work; then came the question, Was it worth having? That depended on the price to be paid. The price was not only the cost of registration and duplicate deeds, but a greatly increased employment of trustees. The whole of the land in England, under the Act, would become vested in trustees. Not only would that be bad for the development of the land (because a trustee could not be expected to put as much energy into it as an individual owner), but it would involve the paying of trustees' fees.

Therefore a very little examination of the Act from a practical point of view would show that the Curtain Scheme was not worth the candle. It was too expensive. All it did was to reduce the examination of title on a sale, and a reduction would only benefit the purchaser's legal advisers, not his own pocket.

It was a scheme for shortening titles by concealing interests from the purchaser. Personally, he was no believer in concealment. As a purchaser, he would much rather know what the real state of the title was than have ingenious operations gone through, learned men meeting together behind a curtain performing mysterious functions while he himself waited outside, and then coming out and saying "You are all right." But would he be all right? His title would depend on the construction of an obscure section of an Act of Parliament, which would very likely break down in the Courts. Therefore he begged members, before they blessed the Act, to study carefully Part I. and the Curtain Scheme, which was its leading feature.

Mr. Harold Griffin (Fellow) thanked Mr. Hunt for the great trouble he had taken in preparing a Paper on so very complicated a subject. He was sure the members needed all the explanation and information upon it which they could possibly obtain.

He was afraid he had not come prepared by any means to bless those voluminous products of legislation. It seemed inexcusable to him to unload such a mass of material at once on an innocent and long-suffering public. Those measures, no doubt, received a good deal of consideration at the hands of the draughtsmen, and probably some attention by the Committees of both Houses, but he thought it would have been far better had the proposals been spread over about twenty years, and the various branches of the subject dealt with at intervals of, say, two or three years between each of them. The new laws might perhaps be beneficial to members of the nobility who indulged in compound settlements, jointures, and other luxuries of that description, but so far as a surveyor who acted for small owners in ordinary transactions was concerned, it appeared to him it would have been sufficient, and much simpler, to have merely remedied the few admitted defects in the law instead of compiling the enormous mass of print, which very few people had time to study.

After all, there were some provisions against the injustices wrought by intestacies which had been handed down for centuries. For instance, so long as misguided solicitors had not barred the dower, a man's widow in such a case had obtained one-third of the income of his freehold property during her life, and where men, as in recent years, had been so fond of buying property in the wife's name, they retained, at all events under similar circumstances, a life interest under the "courtesy of England."

When he was a young man many solicitors had boasted that they always barred dower in the conveyances they prepared, and he had once asked an old solicitor why he did not do it. The solicitor had said that in the majority of cases it did not matter, but it was of great importance to a widow if her husband died intestate as that was just when she needed dower.

Another reason for his dislike of the new Acts was the unnecessary coercion they applied to people who were quite content with the existing system.

There was one point, however, on which he could express admiration, and that was the statutory form of conditions of sale, which probably compressed into the smallest practicable compass all that was really necessary in a contract. For that the present Chancellor, Lord Cave, was to be thanked.

It might seem ungracious to refuse to embrace those magnificent productions of Lord Birkenhead with enthusiasm, but there was a great deal to be said on the other side, and judged only by their efforts at legislation he thought Lord Cairns, by his Conveyancing Act of 1881, had been a much greater benefactor to his country.

Sir Stanford Downing (Hon. Member) said he had not come at all prepared to speak that evening, except that he had so far prepared himself as to have accumulated several pounds in weight of statutes since 1922, although he confessed that he had not read them. He was, therefore, the more thankful to the authors of the Papers who had so kindly brought before the members the essential points.

He imagined that a body of surveyors were not particularly concerned with the question of whether the legislation which was now passed was well or ill-designed. Surveyors had now, presumably, to act upon it. Perhaps the lawyers would find, after a time, that they would be able, by the addition of their own ingenuity to that of the authors of the statutes, to simplify the methods of conveyancing; but so far as surveyors were concerned, it seemed to him that their problems in the future would be very much the same as they had been in the past. Whatever might be the simplification of legal estates, they would have, in fact, for the purpose of valuation and of advising their clients, the same complicated interests in the future as they had in the present; and they would have to advise their clients on the same sort of points as those which they had hitherto had to advise. They would have to value the same sort of interests and rights. There might be a few which would disappear, but, one way and another, a surveyor would be coming across exactly the same rights from the point of view of valuation, and would be dealing with them in the future as he had dealt with them in the past, notwithstanding that, as they had heard from Mr. Sanger, in future all land would be held by the one tenure of common socage, which surveyors would receive with a feeling of much relief, he had no doubt, if they thoroughly understood what it meant. But it seemed to him that the effect of the statutes was that surveyors would, as he had said, have practically similar rights to deal with as in the past. There would be some simplifications, but surveyors would have, in the future, to deal with the same complicated relationships between owners of property and partial owners of property as they had in the past.

One of the outstanding features of the series of Acts was the tremendous augmentation of the rights of the tenant for life to deal with property, which was, of course, in the direction of simplifying dealing in property. He was somewhat alarmed at the prognostication as to the time when the statutes might be found to be of real value and to have effected the simplification which they were intended to effect. Mr. Sanger had said that probably that would happen when the new system had become familiar. He did not know whether that was a shorter period than that which was prognosticated by Mr. Hunt, who had said that the intended simplification would not be brought about until all land had changed hands once.

There were one or two points in Mr. Hunt's Paper to which he would like specially to refer, and first with regard to the removal of restrictions. Speaking in a general sort of way, he thought that owners of property might be thankful that the statutes were not in any sense an attack on ownership of property. There was no attempt to take away or reduce the interests of owners of property. There were one or two things where perhaps the owner of various rights had his toes trodden on slightly, and one of those was in the matter of the removal of restrictions. There was no doubt about it that some simplification of the process for removing obsolete restrictions which had been put upon land was really desirable in the interests of the development of land. It was really desired by those who owned the benefit of the restrictions who were frequently as much tied by them as the people who otherwise wanted to get rid of them. There was a little element there of the new ways of looking at the rights of this matter. When those restrictions were removed, compensation was to be paid, which, of course, was right; but there was now the introduction of that somewhat newer notion that the compensation should be compensation in the limited sense that the man who lost the right to the restriction was to be compensated for what he lost without any consideration of the much greater profit it might be to the person who gained by the removal of the restriction. He supposed, as time went on, there would be more and more of those slight encroachments on the present position of the owner.

The proposal, as it seemed to him, for diminishing the power of an unscrupulous lessor to harry his lessees by schedules of dilapidations was all to the good. He thought that amongst lessors of the decent type that sort of thing was not done; it was only done by those who really acquired property with a view to getting not the legitimate profit out of it, but all the possible illegitimate profit.

The statutory form of contract which had been published was of extreme interest. As one of the speakers had pointed out, everybody who in future made his contract on a sheet of paper would be assumed to know that he was making it subject to those detailed conditions. That, of course, was not likely to be the case; he was not likely to know much about those conditions, but they were such as he ought reasonably to expect to fulfil, and, on the other hand, the gentleman who made a contract on a sheet of paper because he wanted to be free to find some possibility of overthrowing the contract hereafter would be equally bound by those statutory conditions, which would be all to the good.

Surveyors' Institution

Session 1925-1926.

At the Ordinary General Meeting

Held on Monday, 12th April, 1926,

A Discussion took place on Papers relating to

The New Law of Property Act.

Mr. John D. Wallis (President) in the Chair.

The President said that since the last General Meeting they had lost a very old and valued member, one of their Vice-Presidents, Mr. Herbert Mansfield Cobb. He was a man of great ability, of high standing in the profession, of the soundest judgment, and of the strictest integrity. He combined with those high qualities a charming personality. Every member of The Institution who had been so fortunate as to be personally associated with Mr. Cobb felt for him not only the highest esteem but a real and deep affection. They deplored his death, which was a great loss to The Institution; it was a matter of regret that he had not been spared to occupy the Presidential Chair; he would have added great distinction to that office. He (the President) desired to express the debt of gratitude the Council owed

Mr. Cobb for his eminent services as a Member of Council, and he wanted to try and express the very great sorrow and regret that they all felt at his decease and their sympathy with his relatives.

The PRESIDENT said he was sorry to say that they had also heard that afternoon of the death of another highly respected and honoured member of The Institution, Sir Robert Thompson. He was an old member, who had been Chief Valuer of the Valuation Department of the Inland Revenue. He was the first head of that department when it was formed, and he had successfully carried out the responsible task of organising a great new department which had been of real service to the community. Sir Robert Thompson was also a valued Member of Council for several years. He (the President) expressed the great regret of the members of The Institution, and their sympathy with those who were connected with Sir Robert Thompson.

[Those present signified their acquiescence by standing.]

Mr. H. E. SHERWIN (Member of Council) then presented his Paper on "The Law of Property Acts, 1922 and 1924: "Copyholds, Manors, &c."

Mr. J. E. BIDWELL (Member of Council), in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Sherwin for his Paper, said he wished first of all to congratulate the author upon the clear way in which he had dealt with the subject, which might perhaps be described as a "dry" subject. He felt sure that to all those surveyors who in the course of the next ten or fifteen years might expect to do a great deal of work in connection with the extinguishment of copyholds, Mr. Sherwin's Paper would constitute a most valuable work of reference.

It was perhaps rather difficult to realise that now, after the 1st January, 1926, if one spoke of copyhold tenure one was using an improper term, the correct expression being "freehold, or enfranchised copyhold, subject to manorial "incidents." There had been a growing tendency in modern legislation to encourage the employment of a single valuer who would act for both sides. He felt they would all agree with the view expressed by Mr. Sherwin in favour of two independent valuers being employed by the lord and tenant respectively. Except in the most simple and straightforward cases it nearly always happened that there were two sides to every question, and he thought a fairer result was generally arrived at by the previously established practice of two valuers meeting together and going into the question. This was particularly so in relation to two classes of cases which had been cited by Mr. Sherwin, i.e., licensed property and property in which there was a prospective building value. As surveyors they should use their influence to ensure the continuance of the practice of surveyors being appointed on both sides.

It was a matter of particular interest to realise that the extinguishment of manorial incidents could still be carried out at common law, but that voluntary enfranchisement, or rather the extinguishment of manorial incidents, could not now be carried out except with the direct sanction of the Minister of Agriculture.

A point arose in connection with the identification of land. Mr. Sherwin said in his Paper that where copyhold land was intermixed with other land and could not be identified on the Ordnance Survey Map, the Minister would, on the application of either party, identify it. He (the speaker) might be wrong, but his impression was that that was a new provision, and that hitherto the obligation of identifying land where such difficulty arose rested with the lord of the manor. Most of those present had difficult cases in practice where it was almost impossible to locate the copyholds in situ, and such difficulties had to be overcome as best they could with the help of the steward; he did not think that previous to the passing of the Property Acts, 1922 and 1924, there was any right of appeal to the Ministry to identify the land. Another point which should be noted was that in place of the 22¼ years' purchase, which had hitherto been applied for extinguishment of quit-rents, it was now 20 years.

A question arose as to the valuer's fees. He did not doubt that Mr. Sherwin was right in pointing out that the scale which was issued by the Ministry of Agriculture in 1920 was no longer legally effective. It was therefore desirable that, when they as surveyors were employed on business of this kind, they should arrange that the fees payable should be on the scale which was the recognised scale and had been in force since 1920.

On the question of the custody of the court rolls, he thought there was an obligation upon them as surveyors to follow the lead of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Hanworth, and to urge upon any stewards or lords of the manor with whom they might be connected the great desirability of those court rolls being kept in suitable places and not put aside among general papers. Lord Hanworth had made arrangement for storage at certain provincial centres, and of course the Record Office was available for that purpose in London. Those records would be of great antiquarian interest in the future.

He desired to propose a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Sherwin for his valuable Paper.

Mr. B. W. Adkin (Fellow), in seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Sherwin, said he had a great admiration for anyone who took an interest in so fascinating a subject as copyhold. Many students had told him that of all the subjects they studied for the examinations of The Surveyors' Institution they found copyhold the most interesting. He was in complete agreement with nearly all that Mr. Sherwin had said. Particularly did he agree with Mr. Sherwin's statement, with regard to copyhold, that "there is life in the old dog yet."

On the 1st January last they were told that by virtue of the Law of Property Acts, 1922-24, all copyhold was enfranchised and converted into freehold. But the word "enfranchisement" as used in those Acts appeared to have a very different meaning from the meaning they had understood it to bear in the past. Before the 1st January last they had considered that when copyhold was enfranchised and became freehold it was freed from all the manorial incidents to which it had been subject, with the sole exception of what were called "reserved rights," and that such enfranchised copyhold could be regarded as equivalent to ordinary freehold. But those Acts, although they made the land freehold, left it subject to many onerous manorial incidents and to a great extent under the control of the lord of the manor. To-day, he thought, there must be thousands upon thousands of properties which were formerly copyhold and were now freehold, but were not free. The owners of such lands might congratulate themselves upon the excellence of their title, which was probably far superior to that of the ordinary freehold; but the owners would be at some expense before their land would be free from manorial incidents and from manorial control, and, until those manorial incidents were extinguished, the owners were only a little better off than they were before.

Let it be supposed that one of those freeholds which were not free was subject to a quit-rent, to a heriot of perhaps the best beast or best piece of dead goods on the death of the tenant, or to a fine arbitrary on every admission; the owner in that case would not only have to pay a yearly rent, but should he die he would have to pay the value of his best beast, even if it were a racehorse, or the value of the best piece of dead goods, even if it happened to be a new Rolls Royce, and the man who succeeded as owner would have to pay two years' full improved annual value of the land to the lord of the manor, and fees as well. If the owner sold, the conveyance was void unless it was produced to the steward of the manor within six months of the date of the conveyance, and when it was produced, in addition to any sums payable by the vendor, twice the annual value of the property would have to be paid by the purchaser, together with many fees. If the owner held but did not sell, he would have to be very careful what he did; his property would be forfeitable to the lord of the manor if he altered the boundaries, if he committed waste, or if he otherwise infringed the custom of the manor. But the necessity for notice of the act or neglect on the part of the owner, and the power to obtain relief from the court, which was provided for by Section 132 of the 1922 Act, afforded considerable protection to the owner. The question of permissive waste presented rather a pretty problem. Of course the owner of the freehold land which was not free could extinguish manorial incidents and make it free, and no doubt he would do so very soon; he could not do so without expense, but the compensation which was payable to the lord was not excessive, at any rate from the lord's point of view.

There was a great difference between the enfranchisement of copyhold and the extinguishment of manorial incidents; it was no longer one transaction as it used to be. Enfranchisement took place on the 1st January last, and it was dealt with in Part V. of the 1922 Act and in the Twelfth Schedule, those provisions being amended somewhat by the 1924 Act, whereas the extinguishment of manorial incidents was a matter for the future, and was dealt with in Part V. of the 1922 Act and the Thirteenth Schedule, similarly amended. There were a good many difficult problems in connection with Parts V. and VI. of the Act. Mr. Sherwin, under the head "Abolition of Copyholds," referred to the extinguishment rules. He supposed they all appreciated that those rules did not refer to the abolition of copyholds but to the extinguishment of manorial incidents. He thought those rules took the place of the minute and other official forms rather than the place of the Copyhold Act. Notwithstanding what Mr. Sherwin had said, he personally found it very difficult to tell how much of the Copyhold Act, 1894, remained law.

The extinguishment of manorial incidents was perhaps the most interesting part of the subject to surveyors. This extinguishment—or rather compensation in respect of the extinguishment—could be ascertained in some three main ways prior to the 1st January, 1926: Firstly, independently of the extinguishment rules; secondly, under the rules relating to compulsory extinguishment; and thirdly, under the rules relating to voluntary extinguishment, if the Minister so allowed. Of those three methods the first was likely to be the most popular, and when the compensation was ascertained independently of the rules he presumed it would be usual for the parties to agree the amount; but he saw no reason why they should not agree in those cases to appoint a valuer or two valuers; as Mr. Bidwell had pointed out, it would be very much to their advantage to do so. He thought they would take the word "agreed" as meaning agreed by valuation, just as they did under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. When the compensation was to be ascertained under the rules because notice had been served and the parties could not agree, it seemed to him that only one valuer might be appointed. As regards those facilities of improvement or prospective building value, it seemed also that it might be settled by the agreed valuer or a valuer appointed by the Minister to ascertain the annual value. When he referred to the Act he found that by Section 139, 1 (8), the compensation, unless otherwise agreed, should be ascertained in accordance with the new scale which was binding as a matter of law in all cases unless the Minister otherwise decided. He took that to mean that the valuers would be bound to ascertain the compensation in accordance with this new scale, and that the old practice of valuing in accordance with what the valuer deemed to be right would cease. That appeared to be an important difference. The old scale which they were accustomed to, which was compiled by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, was for guidance only and was not binding as a matter of law; but the new scale was part of an Act of Parliament, and was binding as a matter of law in all cases, unless the Minister on application decided to vary the scale.

Mr. H. De Bock Porter (Visitor) said he felt highly honoured at having been asked to speak to so learned an Institution on a subject of this kind. He had a sort of hereditary interest in The Institution, because his late father, Sir Alfred De Bock Porter, had been much gratified when he was made an Honorary Fellow.

The alteration in the law relating to copyhold had had a very sad effect upon him (the speaker) as a lawyer, because it had wiped out at one fell swoop the one section of the law with which he was really well acquainted. Manorial officials had been threatened for many years, and were constantly expecting to have their existence brought to an end. Threatened men lived long, but even they died at last. He had had considerable experience in the working of the new Acts. The secretary to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Sir Stanford Downing, being the Steward of all their manors, appointed deputy stewards to carry out the details of management, and to him (the speaker) fell the details of management of most of those manors which could conveniently be worked from the London office; he was Assistant Steward of the manors generally, and Deputy-Steward of about 160 of those manors. The consequence was that he had not only had to deal with the questions arising under the Act under a group of manors of considerable size, but he had also had to act as counsellor and guide in somewhat unfamiliar country to those deputy stewards who operated in different parts of the kingdom.

Mr. Sherwin in his lucid and excellent Paper was perfectly right in saying that the Ministry of Agriculture did not want enfranchisements carried out as a rule from their office; they did not welcome them and they did not want them. So much he had gathered from interviews he had had with officials of the Ministry. The Ministry had even succeeded in deflecting on to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a group of enfranchisements, or the equivalent of enfranchisements, which used to be carried out by the Ministry, namely, the extinguishment of manorial incidents in those manors in which incumbents of benefices were the lords. The Ministry had been in the habit of carrying out those operations, but had somewhat cleverly engineered them on to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The general impression made upon the minds of the guileless copyholders up and down the country had been that they were going to get something for nothing. When he had been holding manor courts, he had often seen a copyholder looking at him with an avaricious gleam in his beady eyes, and saying "all this was going to be swept away," upon which he (the speaker) would reply that it was going to be swept away, but at a price. It was going to be swept away on terms which, he thought, most of those present would agree with him in calling fair both to the lord and to the tenant. The copyholder would get his freehold, but he would have to pay for it; the payments would be graduated, they would be extended over a reasonable period, but they would have to be made. The Act enfranchised copyholds, but it was then necessary to extinguish manorial incidents, thus making two bites at a cherry.

The general impression which he gathered after three months' working of the Act was that solicitors, generally, did not consider it necessary to employ surveyors. He had the day before received a letter from a solicitor who said it was perfectly absurd to employ a surveyor to do a calculation that the office boy could do quite well. But he personally felt that in acquiring the data for the calculation, the office boy might prove inadaquate and that the surveyor was essential. In a country town where the steward of a manor was the local solicitor, and very often the local mortgagee, he knew the value of the widow Jones' cottage quite as well as the local surveyor; but where, as in his own case, he sat in a London office and dealt with properties in the country, he considered it absolutely necessary that the copyholder should first define his copyhold, supply a plan of that copyhold, and then allow him (the speaker) to refer the case to a surveyor. That procedure he considered to be absolutely essential in order to place before the tenant terms for extinguishing his manorial incidents. In that attitude he was supported by the results of the enquiries he had been able to make at the Ministry of Agriculture, because lords of manors could not tell whether they could carry out a case by a common law compensation agreement until they had stated terms, and he did not think they could fairly state terms until they had employed a surveyor. The copyholder in any case would have to pay a surveyor eventually, because, if he did not agree to the lord's terms, supplied as they would be on the advice of the lord's surveyor, he would go to the Ministry, who would appoint a surveyor if, as was likely, the lord and the tenant were not able to agree upon a man. He did not think anyone could properly deal with a case except with the aid of a surveyor, and they might take it as quite clear that that was the attitude of the lords of a considerable proportion of manors, such as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

When the tenant asked for advice, the proper advice to give him, if he was not contemplating selling his property, was that he need do nothing. But if the tenant contemplated sale or development, or if he wanted to do anything to alter the ownership of his property, he should at once under the provisions of the new legislation extinguish his manorial incidents. The ex-copyhold property under the Act was neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring, but, if he might say so, flesh with a fishy flavour, and most people would be glad to get rid of this peculiar, novel and not altogether pleasant flavour. The tenant, if he transferred the property to a new owner, would bring into force what he thought would be rather a strong impulsion in the direction of extinguishment, because the new owner would have to present his conveyance to the steward within six months.

He had already had a good many such conveyances presented to him. He then sent in a bill which was the bill which would have been payable if the property had remained copyhold—a bill for fines and fees. When asked by the new owners' solicitors what that bill was payable for, he replied that it was still due in respect of the tenure that the land had had and now in some measure retained. When asked for particulars he would send the celebrated old copyhold list of all kinds of things which was known in his office as the "washing bill." When the new owner's solicitor then pointed out that he was paying for a large number of things that he did not get, he replied, "Exactly, "that is the way of copyholds." They would remember that in the old days copyhold property could pass only by surrender. Therefore, as soon as one acquired a copyhold property, one surrendered it to the use of his will in order to be able to devise it. By Preston's Act (55 Geo. III., c. 192), the necessity for surrender to will was abolished, but, with a care for the steward which could not be too highly commended, the Legislature kept the fees which were payable for the surrender to will. There was, therefore, contained in the "washing bill" an item: "Surrender to will "and enrolling." The steward not only charged a fee for the surrender which he did not take, but charged for enrolment which he did not do, and the tenant had to pay. The owner of ex-copyhold property would be very disgusted now to find that there were matters in respect of which he still had to pay something for nothing, and as soon as he found he had got to pay a bill of that sort, he would desire to get rid of such charges. That was one of the great factors which would impel tenants to clear their ex-copyhold title. The practice would gather momentum as the years went on until it would become almost a matter of course for a new purchaser of ex-copyhold property to proceed at once to extinguish the manorial incidents.

The Act provided that the compensation to a steward on enfranchisement was not payable unless the steward was appointed before the passing of the 1922 Act, i.e., the 29th June, 1922. All the deputy stewards of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners depended upon Sir Stanford Downing as their appointing officer. The compensation for these stewards went not to the stewards themselves but to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who would lose that compensation if Sir Stanford Downing were to die or otherwise lose office, with the result that they had had to insure his life for a very substantial sum.

Mr. Graham Mould (Associate) said that after the speech to which they had just listened no one could say that the study of copyholds was a dull subject; apparently the more deeply one dug into the law of copyholds, the more profound humour did one find in the subject. He felt compelled to say that, having now been a member of The Institution for more years than he cared to recollect, it was seldom that he had had the pleasure of listening to a speech at once so humorous and so learned.

He desired to congratulate Mr. Sherwin upon having succeeded in packing into a comparatively small compass nearly all the essential points with reference to the extinguishment of copyhold incidents which were material at the present day. Whether or not they would really miss copyholds, he supposed, depended very much upon the way in which they had regarded them in the past. He could imagine that future students for the examinations might miss the subject; but their feelings would not be those of unalloyed regret.

Mr. Sherwin's Paper contained a reference to the protection against forfeiture. That appeared to him to be a very valuable protection now afforded to a copyholder because, as from the present time, in the event of the lord desiring to enforce any forfeiture, he would have to give notice of the breach, and give the tenant an opportunity of remedying it in those terms with which they were all so familiar. That seemed to him to be a valuable protection to the tenant.

With regard to the employment of a surveyor, he had been a little interested to learn from the last speaker that he occasionally found solicitors suggesting that the employment of surveyors was unnecessary. He could only regard that as being one degree less reprehensible than the suggestion which was occasionally made by solicitors that the employment of counsel was to be deprecated. Perhaps some of the people who were most lamenting the passing of copyholds were those versatile novelists who made, if he remembered aright, the marriage of the very beautiful expectant bride with the hero depend upon the discovery on the last morning of some deed which showed that the land was part of a manor, and that a very valuable racehorse could be seized. From that sort of novel one had gathered from time to time much intimate and useful knowledge as to what a heriot of the best beast might mean in those circumstances.

He desired to add his quota of thanks to Mr. Sherwin. It seemed to him that the present provisions with regard to the extinguishment of copyhold incidents were merely the logical outcome and the inevitable conclusion of a series of Acts which years ago prevented the creation of new copyholds, and which had gradually paved the way for this Act which would ultimately be the means of abolishing copyholds, though it delayed that abolition in some cases for as long as fifteen years.

Miss Skene Smith (Visitor) said that, as a member of the staff of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries dealing with the work under the Property Acts, it had been a very great privilege for her to listen to the discussion by experts with practical knowledge of manorial incidents.

One speaker had enquired whether, prior to the 1st January of this year, the Ministry had power to deal with boundaries. As a matter of fact, in practice the Ministry had very seldom dealt with a case of disputed boundaries in enfranchisement proceedings; but that was due apparently to the great efficiency of the surveyors, as Section 52 of the Copyhold Act, 1894, gave power to the Ministry to define bonndaries if, after the appointment of a valuer, a dispute arose.

The Enfranchised Land (Stewards' Fees) Regulations, 1926, did not cover the work in connection with the extinguishment of manorial incidents, but prescribed fees payable on transactions in respect of the land before those incidents were extinguished. Under paragraph 15 of those regulations the advice of a valuer might be required as to the annual value of the land concerned.

Mr. A. S. Wallis (Professional Associate) said there was one question he desired to ask Mr. Sherwin on a point as to which he had always been very uncertain in his own mind. Would Mr. Sherwin tell him, with regard to tenants in common, whether heriots, quit-rents, reliefs, or any other incidents were paid in full by each tenant in common, therefore necessitating the compensation in full by each tenant in common in respect of those incidents? That point had never been clear to him. If there were three tenants in common, and the quit-rent was £1, would each one pay one-third? He was satisfied as regards the fine arbitrary, but he was not satisfied as to the other incidents.

Mr. J. G. Elsworthy thanked Mr. Sherwin for his admirable Paper. He agreed with Mr. Adkin in deploring on sentimental grounds the passing of copyholds. He remembered that when he had studied for examinations he had always regarded the study of copyholds as a sort of mental relaxation, as it carried one's mind back to the Middle Ages, and right away from the hard and dry land tenure Acts.

There was one question he desired to ask: Would the various rents, the actual rents which would be charged on copyholds, be recoverable by the ordinary means of distraint, or were they only to be recovered as contract debts? He was not clear on that one point.

The framers of this Act evidently thought there was going to be a very important indirect effect from its passing, they evidently thought that, freed from all the vexations of manorial incidents, the life of the tenant was going to be considerably prolonged, for he noticed in the schedule that when the tenant attained the age of 103 years or upwards the compensation payable was £3 9*s.* 6*d.* He thought that alone constituted sufficient justification for the passing of this Act.

The following written communication has been received from Mr. H. G. B. Wyatt (Fellow):—

I consider that portion of the Act which refers to copyhold enfranchisements is a good measure and of benefit to the community as a whole, although perhaps from a sentimental point of view the abolition of the old customs dating back through the ages might be deplored by some. I have had a good deal to do with copyhold property, and I find that a copyhold tenure is often detrimental to a sale, as there are very few of the buying public who understand it, and they "fight shy" of investing in property with something attached to it that they do not understand. With regard to the Act, I should like to refer to that portion which deals with mines and minerals. Under the Act the lord and tenant are empowered to agree that mines and minerals may be included. I am strongly of opinion that it is advisable, whenever possible, to include mines and minerals. In enfranchisements I have found that in the past when the land has been enfranchised subject to the lord's "retaining rights," these rights are sometimes lost sight of after a number of years, and I think there is a greater danger of this in future, so that the lord might lose something which might eventually prove of considerable value, or the tenant might so develop his enfranchised land as to make the working of the minerals practically impossible. Personally I think that where valuers may have to advise, it is advisable to include these and any other "reserved rights" that are possible.

Mr. H. E. Sherwin has sent the following reply to the criticisms of the various speakers :—

Although the resolution proposed by Mr. J. E. Bidwell and seconded by Mr. B. W. Adkin, and supported by other speakers, has not yet been approved, I desire to express my sincere appreciation of the reception accorded to my Paper.

I have been asked by the Secretary of The Institution to deal with any criticism so that my observations may be printed with the report of the meeting held on the 12th April.

With reference to Mr. Bidwell's point on the identification of land, Section 52 of the Copyhold Act, 1894, as Miss Skene Smith pointed out, gave power, where any doubt or difference of opinion existed, for the lord or tenant after the appointment of valuers to apply to the Ministry to settle the boundaries.

I think that the obligation to define the boundaries of copyholds has rested with the tenant and not with the lord, and I have always acted accordingly. This is similar, really, to the obligation of a lessee to define the boundaries of his leasehold.

With regard to valuer's fees, it is important, I think, to remember that the "extinguishment rules" do not apply to a "common law" extinguishment of manorial incidents. I submit, therefore, for the consideration of members, the question of requiring tenants to agree to pay some nominal fee before terms for such extinguishment are named, otherwise tenants may, after obtaining terms, proceed by compulsory extinguishment under the 1922 Act, which might result in the lord's valuers receiving no remuneration for work undertaken.

The only criticism by Mr. Adkin appears to be to my reference to the "extinguishment rules" under the heading of "Abolition of Copyholds." I mention those rules under that part of my Paper by referring members thereto who desire to know how much of the 1894 Act remains unamended, but I thank Mr. Adkin for emphasising the fact that the rules in question do not refer to the "abolition of "copyholds," but only to the "extinguishment of manorial "incidents."

As so many lawyers are contending that there is no occasion for lords to employ valuers, and, therefore, for tenants to pay such valuer's fees, and furthermore, that the "extinguishment rules" apply to a "common law" extinguishment, which they do not, I was pleased to note the remarks of Mr. Hugh De Bock Porter, Official Solicitor, Assistant Steward and Deputy Steward of Manors of the Ecclesiastical Commission, which I think members should specially bear in mind.

I am pleased that my Paper should have elicited comments from Miss Skene Smith, the first of such speakers, I think, at the Senior Meetings. She very kindly dealt with one point raised by Mr. Bidwell. Her remarks should be noted that the fees covered by the Enfranchised Land (Steward Fees) Regulations, 1926, are not included in the words "costs and expenses" mentioned in Section 139 (1) (iv.) of the 1922 Act. I thank her for the correction.

Perhaps I should add here that the word "fourteenth" should be substituted for "twelfth" in the penultimate paragraph of page 199 of the March Journal.

With reference to Mr. A. S. Wallis's question, as tenants-in-common have separate titles, undivided shares, my reply is in the affirmative. The quit-rent, for instance, payable by one tenant-in-common might be more or less than that payable by other tenants-in-common having interests in the same property.

I am not quite clear as to what "annual rents" Mr. J. G. Elsworthy refers. If he refers to quit-rents, for instance, then Section 130 (5) of the 1922 Act, limiting action for recovery as simple contract debts, refers only to fines and heriots as stated in my Paper. If he refers, on the other hand, to compensation rent-charges, then Section 121 of the 1925 Act specifies the remedies for recovery.

Sir John Oakley's Paper was then discussed.

Mr. D. A. Rawlence (Fellow), in moving a vote of thanks to Sir John Oakley for his Paper, said he thought they should take off their hats to those who had so kindly studied and summarised these complicated Acts so that the members of The Institution could understand them. In wading through the Acts he had himself realised the difficulty of understanding them and the extent of the work done by the authors of the Papers.

Trustee Act.—Little remained to be said on the Trustee Act after what Sir John Oakley had set out in his Paper. Section 12 (2) gave powers to cut land up for the purpose of sale, either horizontally or verticallly, i.e., powers were given to sell the minerals apart from the surface. It was rather interesting to note that under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, executors and administrators held those powers which were now extended to trustees. The provisions of Section 18 might land anyone into a large trusteeship as personal representative of a deceased single-acting trustee. He could understand that in such circumstances the personal representative would suffer a certain amount of embarrassment on coming into a huge job of which he had no knowledge. He was sorry to see that Section 19 had not been altered; as it stood, a trustee had power to insure against fire only up to three-quarters of the value of the property. He had to confess, acting for trustees in some cases, he had ignored the law himself; for instance, in one trust he had insured for £10,000 a valuable picture which was a chattel under a trust. He did not think he would be doing right if he insured for only £7,500.

He would also like to see an alteration in the law as contained in Section 20. If there should be a fire on a trustee estate where the tenant for life was not impeachable for waste, so far as he could see the tenant for life could take the whole of the insurance money either for buildings or chattels and put it in his own pocket. This might not be of much use to the tenant for life, for under the Fire Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774, any person interested could require the insurance company to expend the insurance money in reinstating the building, or require security to be given that that should be done. It had been held that that Act applied generally to buildings in England and Wales. Therefore, so far as a building was concerned, it seemed that a tenant for life might be compelled to reinstate it; but what would be the position with regard to a chattel such as a valuable picture which could not be replaced? Under the Act it appeared that in such a case the tenant for life could put the insurance money into his own pocket provided he was not impeachable for waste.

Section 23 was a cause of complaint on the part of surveyors, because it gave powers to appoint an agent to carry on the trust business, and it would be seen from the wording of the Act that surveyors were entirely left out, or at best were included in the expression "other person," following the words "solicitor, banker, and stockbroker." Again, in Sub-section (3) (a) the solicitor was to the fore, whilst in Sub-section 3 (c) only bankers and solicitors could give a discharge for money receivable for a loss on a policy of insurance. He ventured to think if there were as many chartered surveyors in the House of Commons as solicitors and barristers, that section would have been very differently worded.

Universities and Colleges Estate Act.—He thought Sir John Oakley's first paragraph dealing with the Universities and Colleges Estate Act, 1925, required enlarging. It would be seen from Section 1 of that Act that the Colleges of Eton and Winchester were both included. But those two colleges were also dealt with under the Public Schools Act, 1868, (31 and 32 Vict., chap. 118), which embraced Westminster, Charterhouse, Harrow, Rugby, and Shrewsbury; and there were several amending Acts, none of which had been repealed. The most important amending Act was the one of 1873 (36 and 37 Vict., chap. 62), under Section 2 of which Eton College was given powers to invest their funds in the name of the "Provost and Fellows of Eton "College," and to manage their own finance. Throughout the 1925 Act it would be found that all moneys were dealt with by the Ministry of Agriculture, and it was clear that here was a clash between the Public Schools Act and the Universities and Colleges Estate Act, 1925. He was informed that so far as their finance was concerned, Eton College could keep to their old Act, at the same time taking any "plums" they could out of the new Act.

Sir John had summarised the Act as, generally speaking, granting to a college the power of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act. This was correct except with regard to timber. In the Universities and Colleges Act there was not one word said about timber. It would be remembered that in Section 66 of the Settled Land Act, where the tenant for life was impeachable for waste, three-quarters of the proceeds of a sale went to trust funds and one-quarter to the tenant for life. Legally, unsevered timber, even if sold at a separate price, was regarded as "land," and therefore, under Section 5, would be capital. But if the timber was sold by severance, whether it was ripe timber or only thinnings, the colleges could do what they liked with the purchase money. As a matter of fact, most colleges invested three-quarters as capital and spent the other fourth as income.

In Section 6, he thought, the new Act did right in returning to the original 21 years for a lease at a rack-rent. He imagined some of those present were still smarting under 21 years' leases executed before the war, but it would have been far worse had the leases been for 50 years.

Section 12 was very interesting to those who dealt with the mining rights of the colleges. That section made it obligatory to devote two-thirds of mining royalties, &c., to the purchase of land or the carrying out of defined improvements. He had recently been told by a bursar of a college, which enjoyed a considerable income from mining royalties, that the most important provision of the law was contained in the part of the section that was not there—(i.e., there was no time-limit), therefore they could invest the money until such time as it was needed, enjoying the income in the meantime. In fact, they followed the precedent created by the famous "White Queen" in Alice through the Looking-Glass, and put the money on the financial shelf, labelling it "Jam "for to-morrow."

The two schedules of the Act followed almost word for word those of the Settled Land Act. There was a special section dealing with dry-rot, and giving power to use capital funds for dealing with it; but there was not a word said about the boring beetle which created such havoc in old oak timber, and a college would have to raise money by mortgage under Section 30 to cope with any restoration made necessary by the ravages of this pest.

Land Charges Act.—Turning to Section 10 of the Land Charges Act, he foresaw all sorts of difficulties. It gave power to charge property with certain rents which arose out of it. He supposed a case where A had a rent-charge arising on an estate owned by B of 3,000 acres, it being quite impossible to ascertain where the rent-charge arose. A then heard that the owner B was about to sell some of the property. A might then slip in a registration of his rent-charge as against the whole estate. Not knowing where the charge arose, he could not do otherwise than put it on the whole estate. The solicitors, in making their official search before sale, would find this charge registered against the whole estate. He could foresee endless wrangling over the identification of the land charged, and in the end it might possibly have to be got rid of by payment of an exorbitant number of years' purchase in order to clear the title for the contemplated sale.

Administration of Estates Act.—Dealing with the Administration of Estates Act it was interesting to notice the provisions of Section 46, because first cousins once removed and back in a direct line to the common grandfather appeared to be the limit of inheritance in cases of intestacy; if there were no such relatives, the estate went to the Crown. The result would be a considerable increase in the number of properties falling to the Crown on intestacy.

Mr. W. H. Scanlan (Professional Associate), in seconding the vote of thanks, said he appreciated the difficulty which confronted Sir John Oakley in condensing those five rather long Acts into such a useful review. He desired to emphasise the importance of studying the definitions contained in the various statutes. He would proceed to indicate a few other provisions of the Acts which might be of interest:—

Trustee Acts.—Trustees lending money on the security of property were given protection against breach of trust by Section 8, provided they had acted under the advice of an able and practical surveyor or valuer. That provision should favourably influence the engagement of surveyors. Section 10, by which powers were given to trustees to leave two-thirds of the purchase money of land sold on mortgage, would be helpful in the development of estates. Section 18 seemed to him to be rather unfair. A personal representative, who was perhaps quite an able man, was appointed; but if he died prematurely, one's estate might be saddled with a man who did not know and would not have chosen. The provisions of Section 20, in addition to those mentioned in Sir John's Paper, provided for the manner in which the moneys received might be applied.

Universities and College Estates Act.—The object of this Act being to lay down rules for the management of the several estates mentioned, it merited perusal, especially by those who were likely to conduct negotiations with those estates. The point he thought most worthy of note was that, although the estates themselves had limited powers, it was only necessary to apply to the Minister for his sanction to extend them to any extent.

Administration of Estates Act.—The provision in Section 33 prohibiting the personal representatives from selling the reversionary interest unless there was great need, appeared to be rather a hardship, as it would have the effect of holding over the closing of estates for a good many years; whereas, if the reversion was more than 50 years' distant, there was no reason why the estate should not be closed on that account. The value would not, as a general rule, be appreciably increased if the reversion was anything more than 50 years. The section also provided that personal chattels should not be sold except for special reasons or want of other assets.

Land Charges Act.—With reference to Part I., dealing with "Pending Actions," he thought that under Section 3, Sub-section (1), a purchaser would not be protected if the pending action was unregistered provided express notice were given. One point which was rather interesting was that the local authorities had to register the various charges which they had, and were empowered to make rules for giving effect to the registration of local land charges. For instance, any interest which they might have under the town planning schemes would have to be registered (Part VI., Section 15).

The discussion was then adjourned to the next Ordinary General Meeting of The Institution on the 10th May, 1926.

The Report of the Council on the affairs of The Institution and the Statement of Receipts and Expenditure for the year 1925 were read.

IT WAS RESOLVED—"That the Report of the Council and the Balance Sheet be received and approved, and be printed and circulated with the Transactions."

IT WAS RESOLVED—"That the thanks of The Institution be given to Messrs. H. C. NEWMARCH and H. S. LOGSDON for the efficient performance of their duties as Auditors, and that they be requested to continue their services for the coming year."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution are due and be given to the President, Vice-Presidents, and the other Members and Associates of The Council, for the able manner in which they have administered the affairs of The Institution."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution are due and be given to Mr. A. Norman Garrard (the Honorary Secretary), to Mr. Alexander Goddard (the Secretary), and the other Officers of The Institution, for the able manner in which they have executed their several duties."

It was Resolved—"That the thanks of The Institution be given to Messrs. C. S. Burkett-Smith, W. R. Davidge, R. J. Dibdin, H. A. Glover, H. C. Graham, H. W. Langdon, R. B. Mann, D. A. Rawlence, and J. A. Rosevear, for their services as Scrutineers."

The Chairman presented the following Prizes won by Candidates in the Preliminary and Professional Examinations, 1926 :—

for the highest marks (over 75 % of the maximum) in the Final Examination, to Vincent Noel Chester, who obtained 823 marks out of 1,000.

Mr. Chester was also the winner of

being the Interest accruing on a Sum of £500, awarded to the Candidate in the Final Examination who, having passed the Intermediate Examination in the Non-Students' Division, is found to have obtained the highest number of marks in the two Examinations combined.

THE "PENFOLD" SILVER MEDAL for the highest marks (over 75 % of the maximum) in the Students' and Non-Students' Divisions of the Intermediate Examination, to Reginald Charles Ward Davey, who obtained 806 marks out of 1,000.

Mr. Davey was also the winner of awarded to the Candidate at the head of the list in the Students' Division of the Intermediate Examination.

THE "DRIVER" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £500,

for the highest marks obtained by a Non-Student Candidate in the Intermediate Examination, to Herbert Leslie Hale, who obtained 758 marks out of 1,000.

THE "CRAWTER" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £200,

for the best work in "Principles and Practice of Valuation," to Geoffrey Weston Aplin, who obtained 96 % of the maximum marks.

THE "BEADEL" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £200,

for the best work in the subject of "Agriculture," to Frank Edward Weaver, who obtained 87 % of the maximum marks.

THE "SPECIAL" PRIZE OF THE VALUE OF £10 10*s.*

to Jack Franklin Beasley, with an aggregate of 787 marks out of 1,000.

to James George Morley, who obtained 90 % of the maximum marks in this subject.

THE "QUANTITIES" PRIZE OF THE VALUE OF £5 5*s.* to WALTER LAWRENCE JEFFORD, who obtained 85 °/₀ of the maximum marks.

THE "GALSWORTHY" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £500,

awarded to the Candidate in the Final Examination who, having passed the Intermediate Examination, in the Students Division, is found to have obtained the highest number of marks in the two Examinations combined, to GEORGE STIRK CLARK.

THE "MELLERSH" PRIZE,

BEING THE INTEREST ACCRUING ON A SUM OF £100,

for the best work in "Outdoor Forestry, Timber Valuing "and Measuring," to FRANCIS JOHN TRUMPER, who obtained 77 °/₀ of the maximum marks.

THE "PRELIMINARY" PRIZE OF THE VALUE OF £2 2*s.*

to WILLIAM BURT PUNCHARD, who obtained 390 marks out of 500.

THE FIFTY-EIGHTH

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING,
Monday, 31*st May*, 1926.

The death of the Queen Mother, Queen Alexandra, in December last, was looked upon by her subjects in all parts of the world as a direct and personal loss, a feeling which was embodied in the humble Address of condolence from The Institution which was tendered to His Majesty, our Patron, on that occasion.

Of the numerous matters which have been dealt with by the Council during the year, there are two which stand out as somewhat exceptional.

In July the South African Institute of Quantity Surveyors, an incorporated body of high standing in the Dominion, to which a number of members of The Institution already belonged, was affiliated with The Institution at the request of the members assembled at their Annual General Meeting; and in January Mr. J. E. Drower, C.B.E., attended a Conference of Surveyors in Paris, called by the Géomètres-Experts Français, which has resulted in the foundation of an International Federation of Surveyors, of which Mons. Ronplinsky, Brussels, has been elected President and Mr. Drower Vice-President. These matters are interesting as showing that the authoritative position occupied by The Institution is recognised both in the Dominions and on the Continent.

Membership.

The statistics of membership continue to show an increase, the total being 6,513 compared with 6,343 at the same date in 1925. This increase has been mainly due to an increase in the Professional Associates and to candidates being enrolled as Probationers consequent upon their passing the Intermediate Examination.

In 1883, "Associates" were divided into "Ordinary" and "Professional" Associates.

Among the members of The Institution of thirty-five years' standing and upwards whose deaths during the year have to be deplored may be mentioned Mr. Arthur Vernon (1876), Past-President, Mr. H. M. Cobb, C.B.E. (1882), Vice-President, and Mr. Stanley Hicks (1883), Member of Council, to all of whom The Institution owes much for many years of willing and untiring work, and of whom obituary notices have already appeared in the Journal; Mr. Ralph W. Clutton, Reigate (1870); Mr. R. A. Notley, London (1871); Mr. J. Lucas, St. Leonards (1882); Mr. T. J. Holland, Cambridge (1883); Mr. T. A. Fuller, Derby (1884); Col. G. E. Kent, Portsmouth (1884); Mr. H. Barratt, Stourbridge (1885); Mr. C. W. Tindall (1887); Mr. R. E. Middleton, London (1888); Col. G. W. Raikes, Warwickshire (1888); Mr. Chas. Brown, Scotland (1889); Mr. P. M. Puckridge, Wilts (1889); Mr. Thomas Wacher, Canterbury (1889); and Mr. J. Walker, Notts (1890).

Mention must also be made of the death of one of The Institution's most distinguished Honorary Members, the Right Hon. Viscount Milner, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., whose services to the nation and the Empire during many years of strenuous public work will ensure him a permanent place in the history of our country.

Finance.

On the recommendation of The Institution auditors, some changes have been made in the method of preparing and presenting the accounts.

Under the old Receipts and Payments Account certain items of a capital nature were included, such as capital invested and the entrance fees of new members. For this account an Income and Expenditure Account has been substituted, which will deal purely with the income and expenditure of the year under review, without bringing into account capital charges, and receipts or balances brought forward from the previous year. It will thus show at a glance the actual results of the year's working in respect of income, and, by eliminating capital receipts and expenditure, prevent the over-estimation of the yearly income which, under the present system, has occasionally arisen through a misunderstanding of the accounts.

This alteration, and some less important changes in the form of the Balance Sheet, are open to the temporary objection that the break in continuity militates against the comparison of the 1925 accounts with those of previous years. This doubtless is the case, and, without the above explanation, the totals of the new Income and Expenditure Account for the year under review might seem to compare unfavourably with those of previous years. The auditors' report, however, shows that the financial position of The Institution remains satisfactory, the excess of income, after taking credit for the surplus on Examination Account, over expenditure amounting to £1,190 12*s.* 9*d.*

During the year £1,001, Capital Account, derived from the entrance fees of new members, has been invested in 3½ per cent. Conversion Loan, and £1,542, balance on Examination Account, in the same security for the Scholarships Account.

The Examinations.

The reports of the examiners since the war have indicated that candidates should possess a sound foundation of general education if they are to take full advantage of their professional training. Many appear to find it difficult to grasp the principles underlying some of the professional subjects. In order to insure that candidates for the professional examinations possess the general education required, the Council have decided that after the examination in 1928 the following amendments to the Rules of Examination shall operate:—

(a) All candidates for the Intermediate Examination, up to the age of 25 years, will be required to have passed either the Preliminary Examination of The Institution or one of the exempting examinations laid down in the Rules of Examination;

(b) All candidates for the Intermediate Examination, of 25 years of age and over, who have not passed one of the examinations referred to in (a) will be required to have passed a special test of general education, comprising papers on advanced arithmetic; the elements of economics (particularly as applying to rent, value, taxation, and wages); general knowledge; and essay writing. This test will be held each year in January at the same time and places as the Preliminary Examination.

In the circumstances all candidates desiring to sit for the Preliminary Examination will be permitted to do so without enquiry as to their position at the time. The usual enquiry into the suitability of the professional training which applicants may be receiving will be made when they apply for enrolment as students or for permission to sit for the Intermediate Examination.

Tables C and D show the number of candidates who sat for the examinations and the number who passed.

Ninety-six candidates came up for re-examination in their Typical Subjects, and of these 66 were successful.

The number of examinees sitting at Glasgow was 37, of The Special Diploma Examinations.

The examination for the Diploma in Agricultural and Tenant-right Valuations was the only one held in 1925, a sufficient number of candidates not having entered for the other subjects.

For this Diploma 6 candidates presented themselves, of whom Mr. Arthur Gadd (Kingston-on-Thames), Mr. John Holliday (Cockermouth), and Mr. D. G. Parrott (Farnborough), were successful.

1926 being the triennial year, examinations in all the subjects will be held, the numbers of candidates who have entered being as follows: Forestry, 5; Sanitary Science, 4; Land Surveying and Levelling, 2; Rating, 17; and Agricultural and Tenant-right Valuation, 7.

The Examiners.

There have been several changes among the examiners owing to death or retirement. Mr. Aubrey Spencer takes Agricultural Law, vice Mr. J. W. Willis Bund; Mr. W. E. Watson, Law of Landlord and Tenant, vice the late Mr. H. W. Carlton; Mr. G. T. McCaw, Surveying and Levelling, vice Mr. A. E. Gayer; Mr. W. Townend, the paper in Valuations in Sub-Divisions I. and III. of the Final Examination, vice Mr. W. Selves Walker, who now takes the typical paper (Sub-Division II.) in place of Mr. Frank Hunt; and Mr. C. H. Sample, Report, Sub-Division I., vice Mr. W. G. S. Rolleston.

The following is a complete list of the examiners, and the Council desire to acknowledge here the indebtedness of The Institution for the efficient manner in which they carry out their responsible and heavy duties :—

The College of Estate Management.

In the recent professional examinations, of the 218 candidates who were successful in passing the Intermediate, and the 156 who passed the Final, 156 and 130 respectively were prepared by the College, as were also the 8 candidates who passed the Special Examination for degree-holders. Twelve out of the fourteen prizes and medals were obtained by College students.

Mr. J. M. Clark (Past-President), was nominated a Governor of the College on Mr. J. D. Wallis being elected to the presidency of The Institution, and thereby becoming an ex officio member of the Board of Governors.

On Sir John Oakley being elected President of the College, Mr. C. J. Howell Thomas, C.M.G., was nominated a Governor in his place.

The Institution Scholarships.

Twenty candidates presented themselves at the competitive examination for The Institution Scholarships carried out in January by the Oxford and Cambridge Schools Examination Board, two of whom did exceptionally well, and were reported upon by the examiners as having attained special distinction.

To these two candidates, Mr. G. N. Simmons, Leighton Park School, Reading (a son of Mr. Edgar John Simmons, Fellow), and Mr. S. C. Barkin, Holloway County School, scholarships of £80 each, tenable for three years at any recognised University in a course approved by the Council as appertaining to the surveyor's profession, were awarded.

Scholarships of £50 each, subject to similar conditions, were awarded to Mr. G. H. Abbott, Colfe Grammar School, Lewisham, and Mr. S. W. F. Patching, Westminster City School, who also did well.

It will be remembered that the object of these scholarships is to enable young men desirous of entering the profession in the future to obtain the highest theoretical training available prior to starting upon their practical training in the offices of qualified surveyors. The course taken at the university selected must bear upon the practice of the surveyor, and scholarship holders are required later to enter the profession and qualify for membership of The Institution.

The Publications.

The following Papers have been read and discussed during the session:—

Date.	Subject of Paper.	Author.
1925.
Nov. 9 ...	The Opening Address ...	The President.
Dec. 7 ...	Modern Methods of Road-making. Illustrated by lantern slides.	C. H. Bressey, C.B.E. (Fellow).
1926.
Jan. 11 ...	Recent Forestry Development	W. Ling Taylor (Fellow).
Feb. 8 ...	Rating and Valuation Act, 1925	E. M. Konstam, C.B.E., K.C. (Visitor).
Mar. 8 ...	The New Law of Property ...	C. P. Sanger (Visitor).
	The Law of Property Act, 1925	Frank Hunt, C.V.O. (Member of Council).
	The Settled Land Act, 1925	C. Herbert Bedells (Member of Council).
	The Law of Property Acts, Copyholds, Manors, &c.	H. E. Sherwin (Member of Council).
	The Trustee Act, the University Act, Land Charges Act, Administration of Estates Act, and the Land Registration Act	Sir John Oakley (Past-President).

The last two Ordinary General Meetings were devoted to the discussion on the five Papers dealing with the new statutes affecting alterations in the law of property; by this means the object of the Council in drawing the attention of members to points in connection with which the amendment of the law has affected the practice of surveyors has been attained. The meeting on the 10th May, which was also set apart for this purpose, had to be cancelled on account of the General Strike.

In the Journal, memoranda or reports by the Council have been published on the Rating and Valuation Bill, 1925; Measures for the Protection of Underground Water; and Compensation for Property Scheduled under Improvement Schemes. Copies of these were sent to various Ministers and Government Departments concerned.

Articles have also appeared on Quantity Surveyors' Fees for State-aided Housing Schemes; Estate Accounts; the Tithe Act, 1925; Time for Notice of Appeal under the Valuation (Metropolitan) Act, 1869 (Counsel's Opinion); and other subjects of general interest.

The Council are greatly indebted to members and others who, either by Papers read at Ordinary General Meetings, by articles in the Journal, or otherwise, have placed their knowledge and experience at the service of The Institution.

Through the courtesy of the Ministry of Health, notices as to the position up to date of all town planning schemes in course of preparation continue to be published. Members concerned in estates likely to be affected are strongly advised to give careful attention to these.

It has been decided to follow the precedent established in connection with the Agriculture, Rent Restrictions, and Town Planning Acts, and to issue a Memorandum on the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. This is at present being prepared by Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve, Barrister-at-Law.

The Standing and Special Committees.

There have, during the year, been 12 meetings of the Council and 82 of the Standing and Special Committees. The latter have dealt with such diverse matters as Technical Education; Reinforced Concrete By-laws; Agricultural Policy; the Amendment of the London Building Acts; Sites for Garages; Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925; Certificates of Bad Farming; Amendment of the Law of Light and Air; and Leasehold Enfranchisement. They have also reported on the following Bills, and the Council have taken steps to secure amendment where such action seemed desirable: The Valuation (Metropolitan) Bill, 1925; the Allotments Bill, 1925; the Rating and Valuation Bill, 1925; the Tithe Bill, 1925; the Architects (Registration) Bill, 1925 (Singapore); the Rating (Scotland) Bill, 1926; the Land Drainage Bill, 1926; and the London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1926.

In addition to the above the Special Diploma holders in Sanitary Science have met on several occasions and prepared a useful report on Model Water By-laws, which was adopted by the Council and forwarded to a Departmental Committee of the Ministry of Health which was enquiring into the subject.

The Professional Practice Committee, acting in co-operation with the Practice Committee of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, drafted a notice laying down the principle which should guide members of the two bodies, in their relationship with other practitioners, in the conduct of their business. This notice has been approved by the Councils of the two Societies and has been issued to all members. The Council feel confident that members of The Institution will carefully avoid adopting any methods which might be criticised as opposed to the spirit of the notice.

The County Branches.

Meetings of the County Branches and their Committees have been regularly held during the year. The notices and reports with regard to these which have been published in the Journal are a clear indication that The Institution has a real and active influence on the profession in all parts of the country. The President and Secretary have attended meetings of Branches in many districts, and have been greatly impressed by the businesslike way in which the affairs of the Branches appear to be administered and by the interest shown in the meetings.

The Annual Conference of Chairmen and Honorary Secretaries of Branches was held as usual in February, and was well attended, every Branch being adequately represented. Various subjects, mainly affecting the administration of The Institution, were discussed, and the decisions arrived at have been reported in the Journal. A report of the most enjoyable Annual Country Meeting, which was held in Liverpool in June, has also appeared in that publication. The attendance was particularly large, and all who attended expressed their appreciation of the arrangements made by the local Reception Committee for their comfort and entertainment.

The following Table shows the officers and membership of the several Branches up to date:—

Junior Meetings.

The organisation of Junior Meetings at headquarters, and in County Branches where the conditions and membership warrant it, has been continued. The attendance in London and in the provinces has been good, and the Council offer their thanks to the Chairmen, Committees and Honorary Secretaries who are responsible for arranging and carrying on successfully this important branch of The Institution's work.

The Chairmen and Hon. Secretaries during the past Session have been :—

—	Chairman.	Hon. Sec.
Headquarters	H. S. Logsdon	A. F. Hooper.
Gloucester, &c.	C. H. Pritchard	C. F. Coleman.
Lancashire, &c.	H. C. Killender	R. Poole.
Warwick, &c.	J. R. Keyte	C. D. A. Powell.
Yorkshire...	C. E. Fox	E. R. Hepper.
Scotland	J. Dunn	J. C. Pinkerton, M.C.

The following Papers have been read and discussed at the London meetings :—

* President's Prize.
† The J. T. Ryde Memorial Prize, given by the Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club.

In addition to these meetings, the Executive Committee have held a number of meetings at which subjects touching upon the welfare of The Institution have been discussed. A visit to the new Mount Pleasant Letter Office was arranged for 27th January, when members were courteously conducted round by some of the staff of H.M. Office of Works. The Annual Dinner at the Connaught Rooms was well attended on 10th December, the President and several members of the Council being present. On the 18th February perhaps the most successful dance yet given was held at the Wharncliffe Rooms, Great Central Hotel. The President and other members of the Council attended with parties, nearly 400 tickets being taken. An anonymous donor generously provided the band, and the Benevolent Fund benefited to the amount of £67 12*s.* 1*d.*

After the war the age limit, for the purpose of Junior Meetings, was advanced to thirty-five in order to enable those who had been responsible for the management in 1914 again to take charge. It has now been decided annually to reduce the age by one year until the pre-war age of thirty has been reached.

Regular programmes of meetings have also been carried through in the Gloucestershire, Lancashire, Warwickshire, Yorkshire, and Scottish Branches, indicating an interest and keenness among the younger members which can only conduce to the advantage of The Institution in the future.

Among the subjects upon which Papers have been read may be mentioned "The Break-up of Large Estates," "Land "Acquisition for Public Purposes," "Receiverships and "Mortgages," "The Rating of Coal Mines," "Estate Manage- "ment," and "The Rating Act." Mock arbitrations have been held at several centres, notably in Glasgow, where an entrance fee was charged by which the Benevolent Fund benefited to the amount of £14.

The Institution Staff.

The Council have carefully considered the heavy and multifarious duties thrown upon the Secretary of The Institution, and have come to the conclusion that the time has arrived for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary. Not only will this arrangement, it is hoped, afford much needed relief to Mr. Goddard, who has given himself without stint to the discharge of the duties of his office, but it will set him free for the more personal and responsible work upon which he can most usefully concentrate, and will also, it is hoped, permit further development in the activities of The Institution for the benefit of members.

The Employment Register.

The Register continues to fulfil a useful work, both to those needing assistants and to those seeking employment. Its usefulness, however, might be increased were all members needing partners, or either permanent or temporary assistants regularly to communicate particulars of their requirements to the Secretary.

During the year the names of 85 members out of employment have been placed upon the Register, while particulars have also been inserted of 86 others who, although not unemployed, were desirous of improving their position. Over 50 places as assistants have been filled, and, in addition, a certain amount of purely temporary work has been found for men out of employment. As perhaps might be expected, it has been the Land Agency Section which has found the greatest difficulty in obtaining employment during the year under review.

The Council trust that Senior Members will do their best to help qualified Juniors by making use of the Register whenever they have a vacancy to fill.

Miscellaneous.

In addition to the subjects referred to under the heading of Standing and Special Committees, the following matters in connection with which the Council have been engaged or have taken part may be mentioned :—

Conference with the Minister of Agriculture on The Institution's Memorandum on a proposed Agricultural Policy; Deputation to the Minister of Health on the vexed question of the Compensation to be allowed for Property acquired under Improvement or Reconstruction Schemes under Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925; and conference with Members of the Housing Committee of the House of Commons on the same subject.

The Mineral-Owners' Joint Committee, on which The Institution were represented by Mr. S. L. Thacker and Mr. H. T. Wales; the Optical Convention, by Mr. G. T. McCaw, O.B.E.; Sub-Committees of the Engineering Standards Committee, by Mr. J. E. Drower, C.B.E., and Mr. Edward Willis; a Joint Conference of professional Societies interested on Reinforced Concrete Building By-laws, by Mr. Dendy Watney and Mr. P. J. Waldram; and a Joint Committee of several bodies on the relationship of Technical Education with other forms of Education and Training, by Sir Edgar Harper.

A large number of members took advantage of an official invitation to attend the Shipping Engineering and Machinery Exhibition at Olympia in November, at which they found much to interest them, and were indebted to the Directors of the Exhibition for their hospitality on the occasion of the visit.

During the year the Royal Commission on Mining Subsidence, of which the President is a member, the Departmental Committee on Ouse Drainage, on which Sir John Oakley was serving, and the Rent Tribunal, of which Sir Theodore Chambers, K.B.E., is chairman, and Sir Edwin Savill, O.B.E., and Sir Alfred Gelder members, have issued reports.

Mr. John Willmot (Past-President) has been appointed Official Arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, on the retirement of Mr. J. D. Wallis on his election as President and becoming a member of the Reference Committee.

Mr. Harry German (Fellow) has been appointed by the Minister of Agriculture on the Committee for Tests of Agricultural Machinery; Mr. C. S. Orwin (Associate) by the President of the Board of Trade on the Food Council; and Mr. Arthur Body (Fellow) by the Minister of Health on the Rating of Machinery Committee.

The following honours have been awarded to members during the year:—

Lord Bledisloe, K.B.E., &c. (Honorary Member)	Privy Councillorship.
Sir Stanford Downing (Honorary Member) ...	Knighthood.
Lt.-Col. G. L. Courthope, M.C., M.P. (Associate)	Baronetcy.
Sir J. Walker Smith (Fellow)	Knighthood.
Sir Illtyd Thomas (Fellow)	Knighthood.
Mr. C. J. Howell Thomas (Member of Council)	C.M.G.
Mr. A. Elliott Terry (Fellow)	O.B.E.
Mr. R. Ingleby Smith (Fellow)	O.B.E.
Mr. R. C. Otway (Colonial Fellow)	O.B.E.
Mr. A. W. Money (Fellow)	M.B.E.

ADDENDUM.

Examiners' Reports, 1926.

The standard of attainment shown by candidates was below the average. This is indicated not only by the examiners' reports, but also by the percentage of passes, which, it will be seen from the figures given in the Annual Report of the Council, is lower than usual. The diminution in the standard of knowledge exhibited by candidates has not been confined to any particular subjects, but, with few exceptions, has been general to all.

Carelessness in reading and grasping the questions, lack of system and of clarity in replying thereto, bad spelling and bad writing, are mentioned by many of the examiners as noticeable faults among the candidates. The desirability of a good general education, upon which to base a professional training, is again the subject of comment.

Candidates, in some subjects, should more generally employ sketches to illustrate their answers.

Sub-Division I.

Agriculture.—Many candidates know too little about sheep, and would not seem competent to advise as to the management of grass land, and the preparation of temporary leys and permanent pastures.

Forestry : Outdoor.—Considerable ignorance was shown with regard to the price of transplants, while few candidates appeared capable of measuring up an area of standing timber in a workmanlike and systematic manner. The measurement of single trees was satisfactory. Candidates in Sub-Division II. failed in the identification of common woodland trees, and showed ignorance of the well-known formula for obtaining the total cubic contents.

Indoor.—Ideas with regard to suitable hedges were not very good, and more study should be given to common insect and fungoid pests.

Land Drainage.—More attention should be given to questions of capacity of open channels of various sizes and gradients to discharge required volumes. The rules are simple, and should be well understood by surveyors who might be called upon to lay out systems.

Geology and Soils.—The knowledge of fossils, necessary for the identification of strata, was deficient.

Agricultural Botany.—Many candidates showed a lack of knowledge of farm seeds, which would make it difficult for them to be sure that those delivered were what had been ordered. Heavy losses, particularly in laying down permanent pasture, might result from ignorance on this point.

Report.—Descriptions of property satisfactory; but insufficient attention given to outgoings, the valuation of land occupied by woods, the valuation of standing timber, fences ditches, water supply, sanitary drainage, and sporting rights. Advice as to advantages or otherwise of selling was weak in some cases.

Sub-Division II.

Valuations.—In both the Intermediate and the Final the examiners comment on the failure of candidates to grasp the principles attaching to the use of Valuation Tables. They refer, too, to the lack of method, system and neatness in the work.

As a whole candidates from rural districts showed greater practical knowledge of the value of agricultural properties than townsmen did of urban ones. They showed, too, greater intelligence in dealing with problems outside the general experience of the candidate.

The following concrete examples are taken from replies actually submitted:—

> A large number of candidates in valuing the lease of a block of City offices valued the gross rent of each floor separately on varying tables, and afterwards deducted the ground rent and outgoings capitalised on other tables; many made wild shots in estimating the outgoings, and others, when valuing the freeholder's interest, valued the ground rent for the term of the lease only (forty years), and omitted to place any value on the reversion.

When asked to value the ground rents on small properties, a number of candidates valued the leaseholder's interest instead, and others, although they valued the ground rents fairly satisfactorily, were obviously in doubt as to whether the owner of ground rents is entitled to the reversion to the properties at the expiration of the leases; other candidates, who appeared to understand the use of the tables, valued ground rents at 7 per cent. and the reversions at 6 per cent., and others state that they would value reversions on dual tables (to allow for sinking fund).

A good many candidates in valuing an agricultural estate dealt with the farms in a fairly satisfactory manner, but when valuing the mansion-house placed a figure of about £3,000 upon it, and then deducted £8,000 from the value of the estate as a whole as the cost of modernising the mansion.

Sub-Division III.

Quantities.—Some candidates omitted to cast dimensions and copied long descriptions, thereby increasing the length of the abstracts and leaving insufficient time for billing. The Standard Method of Measurement, having been authorised by agreement between The Institution and the Building Trade Employers, should be extended gradually to all parts of the country.

Analysis of Prices.—The most serious defect in the candidates' papers is the want of method. The questions call for answers in a certain order. Instead of answering the questions in the order asked for, the answers were made out in different orders, so that in a large number of cases some items were overlooked in one answer, and other items overlooked in another answer.

The question of shrinkage and waste of materials in preparation has not been dealt with in a satisfactory manner by the candidates. The proportions of materials specified were frequently increased instead of a percentage added for waste, and apparently no recognised percentage has been given for shrinkage and waste.

The instructions given at the commencement of the paper were not carefully examined by many of the candidates, and many errors were occasioned thereb y.

It is again pointed out that prices without analysis were not asked for, and do not where given, whether right or wrong, obtain any marks.

Constructive and Working Drawings.—Draughtsmanship was very poor, the knowledge of carpentry and joinery was deficient, and candidates showed little idea of design. The candidates as a whole appeared to be lacking in experience both in the Intermediate and Final Examinations.

In Sub-Division II. (Non-Typical) greater attention should be given to the main principles of construction in buildings, such as foundations, walls, floors, roofs, and partitions, such as a surveyor should understand in order to be able to report whether buildings are well constructed and free from defects.

Iron and Timber Roofs.—In steel roof design candidates are prone to use thick and narrow bars or angles, which is quite wrong in roof-work. They should not lose sight of the fact that a 3-in. × 3-in. × $\frac{3}{8}$-in. angle is nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. lighter per foot run than a $2\frac{1}{2}$-in. × $2\frac{1}{2}$-in. × $\frac{1}{2}$-in. angle, has practically the same net area when pierced by a $\frac{3}{4}$-in. rivet, and is a far better strut.

Sub-Division IV.

Advanced Surface and Mine Surveying.—None of the candidates made any attempt to calculate the dip on the south side of the fault for the purpose of obtaining the correct amount of "throw." A somewhat meagre acquaintance was shown with the use which should be made of the published records of magnetic variation.

Acts and Orders and Common Law of Minerals.—Candidates were not aware that brick clay or marl has been held not to be a mineral within the meaning of the Canal Acts.

General Subjects.

Imperial Taxation.—Many candidates appeared to find a difficulty in grasping and applying the principles of what they had been taught. More attention, too, should be given to the difference between assessments for rating and for taxation.

Mensuration.—The work suggests that the subject is not sufficiently studied, but that at the last minute an attempt to cram formulæ is made. Too often candidates use formulæ without showing the least understanding of their meaning. Arithmetical errors were too frequent, many being due to unsystematic setting out of the work and a failure at each step of the calculations to indicate the unit of measurement. Time, too, might be saved by greater forethought in the calculations. There is a tendency to use logarithms unnecessarily; they should be looked upon as an aid to ordinary arithmetical calculations, not as a substitute for them.

Road-making.—A lack of knowledge as regards quantities, materials, and prices was exhibited, while the underlying principles of road-making on undulating or hilly land, and the proper embankments and cuttings, needed more study.

Law of Arbitrations.—Candidates exhibited little knowledge of the Lands Clauses Act, the Agricultural Holdings Act, and the Acquisition of Land Act. Some stated that they had not heard of the last named Act.

Law of Dilapidations.—Though the syllabus includes ecclesiastical dilapidations, few attempted the one question set; of those who did, few showed acquaintance with the subject, especially as regards the Act of 1923. Too little attention, also, had been given to (a) liability to third persons in case of accident or injury, and (b) repairs to fixtures.

Law of Fixtures, Dilapidations, and Easements.—A question as to the measure of damages for a breach of covenant to repair (a) during the term and (b) at the end of the lease, and how in each case the covenant could be enforced, was very badly answered. The Public Health Act and London Building Acts were confused, many candidates omitting to say which they were dealing with, while all who dealt with the metropolis appeared to think that the district surveyor was the final court of appeal, and that his decision whether a structure was dangerous or not could not be contested. A question with regard to the law in respect to water in defined and undefined channels was not appreciated. While candidates were correct in stating that no rights to water flowing in undefined channels could be acquired, they went on to say that easements could be obtained, so that the person who took such water might commit a wrong to riparian owners lower down the river. The three subjects, dangerous structures, riparian rights to water, and sewage, would seem to have been neglected.

AFFILIATED SOCIETY:

SOUTH AFRICAN INSTITUTE OF QUANTITY SURVEYORS (INCORPORATED), 26–27, Connaught Buildings, St. Andries Street, Pretoria, Transvaal.

The Surveyors' Institution

(Incorporated by Royal Charter)

Is established—

1. To secure the advancement and facilitate the acquisition of that knowledge which constitutes the profession of a Surveyor, viz.—the art of determining the value of all descriptions of landed, mineral and house property, and of the various interests therein; the practice of managing and developing estates; and the science of admeasuring and delineating the physical features of the earth, and of measuring and estimating artificers' work.
2. To promote the general interests of the profession, and to maintain and extend its usefulness for the public advantage.

The Institution was established in 1868, was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1881, and has a total membership of over .

The Institution consists of four classes, viz.—Fellows, Professional Associates, Associates, and Honorary Members, with classes of Probationers and Students attached.

A Fellow must be more than thirty years of age, and have qualified for that position by having acquired a practical knowledge of surveying in one or other of its branches as above defined, and have held for at least five years a responsible position in the profession; and must have passed the Examinations called for by the Rules of Examination, or some other Examination in the United Kingdom or the Colonies which the Council may declare to be equivalent thereto.* A Fellow has the right, conferred by the Charter.

to use the letters F.S.I. after his name. A Fellow has also the right, under By-Laws allowed by H.M. Privy Council, to describe himself as "Chartered Surveyor."

A PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATE must be more than twenty-one years of age, a Surveyor by profession, in practice on his own account or employed as an Assistant in a Surveyor's Office, and qualified for the class by having passed the Examinations. A Professional Associate has the right, conferred by the Charter, to use the letters P.A.S.I. after his name. A Professional Associate has also the right, under By-Laws allowed by H.M. Privy Council, to describe himself as "Chartered Surveyor," provided that the fact that he is a Professional Associate is disclosed.

An ASSOCIATE must be more than twenty-one years of age, not a Surveyor by profession, but his pursuits must be such as to qualify him to unite with Surveyors in the advancement of professional knowledge.

An HONORARY MEMBER must be a person who, either by reason of his position or experience, or his eminence in science, may be enabled to render assistance in promoting the objects of the Institution, but who is not engaged in practice as a Surveyor in Great Britain or Ireland. He has the privilege of being present and taking part at all Ordinary General Meetings, and of access to the Library, but no right of voting, discussing, or otherwise interfering in the affairs of the Institution ; nor is he called on to contribute to its funds.

PROBATIONERS must be persons whose period of Studentship has elapsed or persons who have passed the Intermediate Examination, or such other examination, if any, as may be accepted by the Council in lieu thereof ; and such persons may continue as Probationers until the end of the calendar year during which they shall have been for five years enrolled in that class or until the end of the third calendar year after that in which they had passed the Intermediate Examination, whichever period first terminates.

A Probationer is entitled to the use of the Library and Loan Library, to attend the Meetings, and to receive the Journal.

STUDENTS (who must not be under eighteen years of age) qualify as such by passing the Preliminary Examination.

Candidates for Studentship who can produce a Certificate of having passed one of the Examinations mentioned in the Rules, are exempted from this Examination, and may be admitted by the Council on the recommendation (according to a form) of a Member of the Institution. Students are expected to enter for the Professional Examinations under the conditions laid down in the Rules of Examination.

A Student is entitled to the use of the Library and Loan Library, to attend the Meetings, and to receive the Journal. For further privileges as to fees and percentage of marks, see paragraphs 10, 11, 12 and 14 of the Rules of Examination.

Scholarships open to Students and tenable for three years have been instituted at Oxford, Cambridge, and other Universities, of the value of £80 and £50 per annum. Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary of the Institution.

Any person desirous of being admitted into the Institution (excepting to the classes of Probationers and Students) must be proposed and recommended according to a form, in which the full name and qualifications of the candidate must be distinctly specified. This form must be subscribed by him, and signed by at least six Fellows, or four Fellows and two Associates, certifying a practical knowledge of the candidate; or, by four Members of the Council, of whom the President shall be one, after careful enquiry into the antecedents of the applicant.

The proposal so made, being delivered to the Secretary, will be submitted to the Council, who, on approving the qualifications, will nominate the candidate for election by ballot.

The following are the rates of contribution to the funds :—

	Annual Subscription.			Admission Fee.
Student	1	1	0		—
Probationer	1	1	0		—
Associate	2	2	0	3	3	0
Professional Associate	2	2	0	4	4	0
Colonial Fellow	2	2	0	5	5	0
Fellow	4	4	0	7	7	0*

* Unless he was elected a Professional Associate before the first day of January, 1921, in which case the entrance fee as a Fellow shall be £5 5*s.*

No person can become a Member (other than an Honorary Member) of the Institution, unless and until he pays as his first Subscription to the Institution, in the case of becoming a Fellow of the Institution, the sum of Ten Guineas, in the case of becoming a Colonial Fellow of the Institution, the sum of Seven Guineas, in the case of becoming a Professional Associate of the Institution, the sum of Six Guineas, and in the case of becoming an Associate of the Institution, the sum of Five Guineas.

All Fellows, Professional Associates, and Associates, are required, within twelve months after their election, to deliver to the Council an original Paper on some subject connected with the profession, or to make a donation to the Library or Collection.

The affairs of the Institution are under the management of a Council, which is elected annually, and in future will consist of a President and four Vice-Presidents, together with not more than thirty-five or less than twenty-five Fellows, four Professional Associates and two Associates.

The Session of the Institution commences annually on the second Monday in November, and continues to the end of May. The Ordinary General Meetings are at present held once a month during the Session. At these Meetings original communications are read on professional subjects, and their merits fully and freely discussed. Every Member has the privilege of introducing visitors to these Meetings. Members are entitled to a copy of any printed publication issued by the Institution after their admission.
